COUNTESS DE CASSINI

MISS HAY (THE YOUNG POET)

A HUNDRED years have rolled around since the first New Year's reception was held in the White House. A hundred years, and what changes the century has wrought!

In 1801 the Executive mansion at Washington was a great unfinished building, standing in the midst of a sparsely settled district. In coming to take possession of it, President and Mrs. Adams had to drive over in a conveyance from Baltimore — there being no railroads then. The driver lost his way, and when they finally arrived at the new capital of the nation and the house which was being built for the Presidents to live in it was night, and the servants could scarcely find lights enough to make the great rooms distinguishable. They looked "exceedingly barn-like" to Mrs. Adams, in their unfinished and unfurnished state, and were pretty uncomfortable too, from the fact that she could not get enough firewood to keep them warm.

That was in the fall of 1800, by New Year's 1801 the down-stairs portion was still unfinished and unfurnished: Mrs. Adams was using the east room which was designated "the banqueting hall," in which to dry the household linen, and the state parlors were so in the name only. But President and Mrs. Adams decided to hold a New Year's reception, notwithstanding, and it was given in the oval shaped library on the second floor, a handsome room, commanding a fine view of the Potomac and the rising Virginian and Maryland Hills. The first reception refreshments by a colored waiter. Imagine President McKinley attempting such a thing with the thousands of guests who call upon him at the White House reception.

Mrs. Adams and two or three of her successors, tried to return the calls that

Johnson, every President entertained the Senators and every member of the House once during each session of Congress. By the time Mr. Johnson became Chief Executive the number had become so great that he declined to undertake it. Should President McKinley attempt such a thing he band was minister plenipotentiary, and she established the code of etiquette for the President's family, which has continued in vogue almost unchanged to the present time. At first the house in which the President lived was called "The Palace," but a strong anti-monarchical sentiment frowned on this designation, and finally Congress formally declared it "The Executive Mansion" and by that name and "The President's House" it was popularly known, until it was burned by the British in 1814. Then, when its blackened free-stone walls were repainted white to hide the traces of the fire, it was re-christened "The White House," a name that has clung to it ever since.

After the White House was destroyed by the British, it was not occupied again until 1818, and was not completely finished until 1829. From that time forward, the state parlors and east room have been used for the official functions. Great display, particularly among the diplomats, has always characterized these occasions. Some one writing of a New Year's reception at the White House in the early years of the last century, speaks of "the flashing jewels, silken dresses, and nodding

My attention was attracted to what seemed like a rolling ball of burnished gold carried swiftly through the air upon two gilt wings, toward the President's House. It stopped before the door, and from it alighted, weighted with gold lace, the French Minister and his suite. We now perceived that what we had supposed to be wings were gorgeous footmen, with brass chapeaux and gilt braided skirts, and armed with glittering swords.

In our own day, the President's New Year's reception means a dress parade for the entire official contingent. A day or two before the event, the public rooms of the mansion are closed and put into the hands of the White House decorators. Not only the White House conservatory but those of the Agricultural department and the Botanical Gardens as well, are brought into requisition to supply the needed flowers. From the propagating gardens the were made upon them, but the task was herculean, the streets were simply bowled out roadways through the woods, and the mud was apt to be up to the carriage hubs. There was another custom inaugurated during those days, which was even more of a burden to the Presidents' families. Until the administration of Mr.

would do little else during the winter, but gives dinner parties to the ninety Senators and the three hundred and fifty-eight members of the present Congress.

When Mrs. Monroe came to the White House, she vetoed the custom of the President's wife returning calls. She had lived abroad a good deal while her husgiant palms—which are famous in horticultural circles the world over—are brought and placed in the center of the east room, in its deep doorways, and in the corridors.

More than ten thousand small potted plants with blooming blossoms are used in banking the mantels, over the doorways, and on the window ledges. From each mirror hang wreaths of roses and orchids. From each chandelier, hundreds of yards of roped asparagus and smilax reach to the various points of the ceiling, producing a canopy of green marvelously beautiful in its effect. Cut roses, carnations, azaleas, orchids, tulips, hyacinths, lilies of the valley, and the brilliant poinsettia smile from many a nook. In fact, if the President had to pay a private florist for the New Year's decorations of the White House $2,000 would not cover the bill.

The hours of the New Year's reception are from eleven to one o'clock; but long before eleven, a waiting crowd begins to gather, and by the time the doors are opened, it reaches from the steps of the front entrance down through the long, circular driveway of the grounds out on Pennsylvania Ave., and often extends beyond the State, War and Navy buildings over into Seventeenth street. Every grade of society is represented in this throng. The "man with the hoe," in his Sunday best, stands next the man whose bank account may represent six figures. The colored "Auntie" jostles against some richly dressed lady, and passes in ahead of her, to pay her respects to their common Chief Magistrate. To each and every one, President McKinley extends the same kindly greeting. He grasps the hard hand of toil with just as much cordiality, and gives its owner quite as hearty a welcome, as he does the soft, white hand of the stockbroker who comes next. There have always been many who have criticised the Presidents and have cried out against this lack of exclusiveness at the White House, but their protest is lost in the wrathful voice of the people who will endure no such spirit in the Chief Executive of their choice.

On New Year's morning the Marine band takes its place near the conservatory and a band from Fort Meyer or the Navy Yard is stationed in the east hall. On the stroke of eleven the bugler of the Marine band sounds the President's call, and upon the instant the receiving party appears at the head of the family stairway. While the band plays "Lo, the Conquering Hero Comes," they descend. Colonel Bingham, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds and Master of Ceremonies at the Executive Mansion, and Major McCawley, a gallant officer of the Marine Corps who was with the first regiment that landed in Cuba, dressed in the full uniform of their rank, lead the way. They are followed by the President with Mrs. McKinley leaning on his arm, and she smiles and bows her acknowledgments to the persons who are waiting in the corridors. The Vice-President and his wife, and the Secretary of State and Mrs. Hay should immediately follow, but as there is no Vice-President for this New Year (how Mr. Hobart and his gracious wife are still missed!) and as Mrs. Hay is in deep mourning for her mother, Mrs. Gage, the wife of the Secretary of the Treasury, is the presiding hostess of the Cabinet and stands in line next to Mrs. McKinley. In coming down the stairs Secretary and Mrs. Gage are followed by the War Secretary and Mrs. Root, and behind them the Attorney General and Mrs. Griggs, the Postmaster General and Mrs. Smith, the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Long, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Hitchcock, and the Secretary of Agriculture and his charming young daughter who, ing a bouquet of orchids and roses, thus indicating that she is not to be expected to shake hands. The other ladies form a semicircle reaching to the door of the green room, where their husbands leave them to join the party back of the line. This usually comprises the young people who are visiting in the house, the presiding officer of the Senate and Mrs. Frye, the Speaker of the House and Mrs. Henderson, the wives of the Justices of the Supreme Court, some of the Senators' wives, and other prominent persons. The house party at the Executive Mansion is unusually small, as the President's nieces are both engaged in teaching and Mrs. McKinley's nieces are in mourning for their brother, Lieutenant Barber, who died in the service in October. But there is a bevy of pretty girls back of the line, daughters of Cabinet members, the Misses McKenna, the Speaker's daughter, Mrs. Frye's granddaughters, and others well known for their amiable qualities.

As the receiving party takes its place the band strikes up an inspiring air and the reception begins. Colonel Bingham in a clear, distinct voice, introduces each guest to the President and Major McCawley presents them to Mrs. McKinley. The Diplomatic Corps is received first. Lord Pauncefoot, in all of the splendor of the British court dress, as dean, has the precedence and comes forward with a warm handshake and a courtly bow. He is followed by the representatives of the twenty-eight nations which maintain legations at our capital, and they are received in the order of length of service. The Diplomatic Corps is larger now than at any previous time in our history, and nine new plenipotentiaries appear for the first time at the President's New Year's reception, making the pageantry an unusually brilliant one. All of the ambassadors and ministers wear court uniforms, many with embroidery and blazons with decorations and orders. Their wives and daughters wear handsome afternoon toilets. The Orphans, in their brocaded gowns and flaming head-dresses add picturesque touches to the scene. After the diplomats, the President receives the members of the Supreme Court and their families, then the members of the Senate and House, followed by the Army and Navy and the National Guard officers. The officers of the Smithsonian at the various departments follow, and then the Associated Veterans of the war of 1846-'47 come in. They are old men, and make the members of the Grand Army who come next appear quite young and sprightly. After this the general public, which has been patiently waiting aside for hours, is admitted, and greeted quite as cordially as any of distinguished predecessors. The people drift through the state parlors and into the east room and corners. They stand and listen to music or chat with friends, and their numbers increase and the crowd becomes almost unendurable in its density, they begin to slip away. They leave through an improvised doorway made through the window in the east hall. The window taken out from its frame and a temporary bridge is placed from it the sidewalk. This has had to be resorted to, as there is but one front entrance to the mansion, and it is so narrow for both incoming and outgoing guests. At one o'clock the President and the receiving party pass through the rooms down the long corridor and back up-stairs. The bands play for a few moments longer, while the remaining guests take a reluctant leave of the exquisitely decorated rooms, and thus another New Year's reception at the President's house passes into history.

Each of the other five ambassadors and retinues, the Italian, German, French, Russian and Mexican, succeed the dean in the order named. Then the Swedish plenipotentiary, from priority in the service, comes next, and he is fol-

A Beggar Spreading the Truth

An Indian evangelist relates a singular way in which the Gospel truth is being spread abroad throughout India. As this evangelist was one day visiting a country district, he saw a beggar approaching, and supposed that according to the custom he was going about among the houses and shops, singing hymns in praise of Vishnu. But as this man drew near and began to sing, the evangelist was astonished to find him singing a Christian hymn. It seems the man had bought a little book of Gospel hymns, and they pleased him so much that as he went his rounds he sang them in place of his old Vishnuvite hymns. Strange to relate, the people welcomed the Christian utterances rather than the Hindu.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S MEDAL FOR HEROISM...

AS announced in the Million Edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, issued December 5th, the proprietor of this journal purposes to award once a week, a medal for the most meritorious case of personal bravery occurring during each week in the year. The first medal awarded will be for the most deserving act of heroism taking place in the first week of January, 1901. Beginning New Year's Day, every reader is invited to forward to us earliest information of any deed of true heroism occurring in his own locality. Send accounts only of thoroughly authentic cases; tell the story from personal knowledge, not from hearsay. A committee in New York will meet once a week and, on investigating the facts presented, will decide which case is most deserving of recognition. This award is not for heroism in the line of paid professional duty, but for that which is voluntary and spontaneous, and without emolument. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD medal is of bronze, of elegant design. In addition to this award, honorable mention will also be made, weekly, of others who have most distinguished themselves in an heroic way in the same period. Address all letters on this subject to Chairman Medal Committee, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

Destroy Their Own Idols

Rev. W. H. Murray, a missionary in Peking, who for years been doing a good work among blind Chinese students, writes: Now is no longer the Christian chapels and cathedrals that are being consumed by flames (they have all been destroyed) it is the towering idol temples, some of which are being destroyed by the heathens themselves, for, they say, they trust the idols and they could not help, hence this calamity. Amongst these is the Jig Huo Kung, that immense Lama monastery inhabited by the most insolent (vile) lamas of the city. It has been ordered to the ground. It contained on its image of Buddha, about forty feigh.

CHRIST'S triumphal march into Jerusalem was but for a day. The palms of coronation were soon followed by the nails of crucifixion; but it suggests at this impressive hour, the march of Christ down the centuries. If you would realize the resistless might of that long march, set the week we are studying in contrast to the week we are living. This is "the world's week of prayer," during which a Christian population of five hundred millions—some in every land—have all, in some way, hailed Christ as King—thousands in heartfelt, loyal consecration, others only in the flags and dates which unconsciously, but impressively, proclaim that omnipotent forces have been engaged in ceaseless conquests since that "holy week," when the cross had upon it not gold but blood—the blood of the Son of God, slain by Church and State, and when the total of religious statistics was "five hundred" (I Cor. 15: 6), instead of five hundred millions. But let us not forget the "me" in the "millions." "Behold thy King cometh unto thee."

Christ's Kingship Foretold

That it might be fulfilled which was spoken through the prophet. In this indulgent age, devotion turns to Christ more as a Saviour than as a King. But Bible chapters from first to last are bound together by the double thread of scarlet and purple, the Saviourship of Jesus and the Kingship of Christ. He is first presented in the Eden Gospel as the bruised Conqueror of the serpent. In the prophets, his sufferings were so clearly pictured, on the one side, and his royal triumphs on the other, that many of the Jews, unable to understand that a king could be a voluntary sufferer, conceived a theory of two Messiahs. At Christ's birth, the cries mingled, "Unto you is born a Saviour"—"Where is he that is born King?" At his coronation on the Mount of Transfiguration: "He spake of his decease." On the cross, above his wounds, were the words: "This is the King," written in three languages for all the world to note, in the language of religion, of culture and of law. "The Lord's Supper," usually devoted to Saviourship, by its very name points to the Kingship of Christ, and also by its designation as a "sacrament," a word borrowed from sacramentum, the Roman soldier's oath of loyalty. These double pictures of Christ as Saviour and King, culminate sublimely in Revelation in "A throne on which a Lamb as it had been slain."

The opening of our lesson finds two groups interested in the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy which was at hand (Isa. 62: 11; Zech. 9: 9). Jerusalem was crowded for the Passover week when as many as 2,700,000 people are said to have come there annually from all parts of the world. Many of these were Galileans who had seen Christ's miracles, and were almost persuaded that he was the expected Messiah. When they heard in the morning after the anointing that he had spent the night in the suburban village of Bethany, they started forth to meet him, plucking palm branches, which were symbols of royalty, to wave in welcome and strew in his path.

Meantime, Jesus was giving orders to his followers by which he could proclaim himself the fulfilment of prophecy, the Messiah-King. He sent for a young ass on which no man ever sat. This was in accordance with the rule that animals used for sacred purposes must never have borne the yoke. These animals were of nobler breed than with us, and were the chosen carriers of kings (Judges 5: 10; 10: 4; II Sam. 18: 9). Blooded asses are used by the wealthy of the Orient to-day. The enthusiastic bystanders saddled the colt with their own coats and carpeted the pathway along which he was to bear Christ with mingled robes and palms. There is a disposition, even among some Christians, to drop many passages from the list of Messianic prophecies that were formerly placed there. But there is one group on which we must absolutely rely, namely, all passages quoted as Messianic in the New Testament, even though some of them also have another application also. We do not now need the appeal to prophecy, as the apostles did, to prove Christ a king, for history gives nearer proof in his matchless life, his matchless words, his matchless influence that he is the Universal King he claimed to be. But prophecy suggests praise, for it assures us God has been preparing for us a King and a kingdom of righteousness, not yet consummated, from the foundation of the world. We praise God for pardon through Jesus the Saviour; let us also praise him for protection and direction through Christ the King.

The warrior rode the horse, but princes of peace in the East rode upon "white asses." It was but a new utterance of the Christmas song, "On earth, peace." It was a strange thing to proclaim a meek King. Honors in that age went to the cruel Conqueror. But Christ has revolutionized the ideals that Greece and Rome gave to Europe, and made the "gentle-man" the prince of all. The old brutal standards linger on the battlefield and ball field and in the hunt, but they are giving way, and "the meek shall inherit the earth." Men will yet learn that "gores is not glory," and take their pride in peace.

Let us get at the personal side of our "proun religion." "Behold thy king cometh unto thee." "The Master is come, and calleth for thee."

1. "Crown him Lord of all."
2. "Crown him Lord of all."
3. "Crown him LORD of all."
4. "Crown him Lord of ALL."

Let us all help to crown him Lord of all mankind, but first of all let us make sure we have crowned him Lord of all in our lives:

1. King of our sentiment, as Mary did on Indian's soul," and in full surrender he found, as we may also, the peace of mind he sought.

A child with a stalk of grapes picked one grape after another from the cluster, and held it out to her father, till, as affection waxed warm, and self faded, she gayly flung the whole into her father's bosom, and smiled in his face with triumphant delight. So let us in the abandon of perfect love and trust put all we have into the hands of Christ, all we have and all we are, for him to use at will.

Consecration is loyalty, not an oath of loyalty only, but especially a state of loyalty. There is room for debate whether we are not cheapening consecration by too frequent re-consecrations. I believe the monthly "consecration meetings" of young people's societies are impressive and useful, but I fear the deeper meaning of consecration as a state of mind and heart is often overlooked in the frequency of the act of consecration. A man takes an oath of allegiance to his country. Would it be a good thing for him to repeat it in a patriotic meeting once a month? I am not sure it would not, but let him remember loyalty may be perpetual and unbroken. He can be loyal without ceasing, even when he is not shouting for the flag, or even thinking about it. Shall a husband repeat his marriage vow once a month? I am not at all sure it would not be a good thing. Some husbands might improve by adopting the rule to say, "I love you" at least once a the handling of religious funds. It was perfectly proper to have in the temple courtyard a place where worshippers from foreign lands could change their moneys so that every Jew might present the half shekel, the token of Hebrew equality. But the sons of the High Priest were conducting these exchanges in fraud and extortion, and Christ drove them as thieves from the temple. It was in an earlier cleansing of the temple (John 2: 13-16), when there were "both sheep and oxen" to be driven out of the sacred enclosure, that Christ used a whip of small cords, no doubt for the cattle, not for men—and even for the cattle more as a sign than a scourge. But while there were no physical blows for men in this temple cleansing it was a picture of righteous indignation which has its place in any true and full imitation of Christ. "Ye that love the Lord, hate evil." There is such a thing as a "good hater" for repeatedly men are commended for hating what God hates. But it is the evil thing not the person we are to hate. (Rev. 2: 6).

Tenderness with Severity

And the blind and the lame came to him in the temple, and he healed them. This tenderness comes in beautifully with the preceding picture of Christ's severity. The two qualities go together in all well-rounded manhood. Let us be angry only at sin, but oftener gentle and kind.

A noted manufacturer in this country who has three thousand men in his employ, says: "I never allow myself to speak harshly even to the poorest boy among my work-people. It does not pay. I have tried kind words, without exception, for years, and the results have been admirable."

It was the gentleness of Christ that gave us the word "gentleman."

"I beg your pardon," and with a smile and a touch of his hat Harry Edmond handed to an old man against whom he accidentally stumbled, the cane which he had knocked from his hand. "I hope I did not hurt you. We were playing too roughly."

"Not a bit! not a bit!" said the old man, cheerily. "Boys will be boys, and it's best they should be. You didn't harm me."

"I'm glad to hear it," and lifting his hat again, Harry turned to join the playmate with whom he had been frolicking at the time of the accident.

"What do you raise your hat to that old fellow for?" asked his companion, Charley Gray. "He's only Giles, the huckster."

"That makes no difference," said Harry. "The question is not whether he is a gentleman, but whether I am one; and no true gentlemen will be less polite to a man because he wears a shabby coat, or hawks vegetables through the streets, instead of sitting in a counting house."

"AND MANY SPREAD THEIR GARMENTS UPON THE WAY AND OTHERS BRANCHES"

the eve of that memorable, first Palm Sunday.
2. King of our property, as they did who yielded up their property, the asses, when the message came, "The Lord hath need of them." The cleansing of the high priests' bazaar in the temple touches another aspect, the frauds sometimes perpetrated by respectable, and even churchly money-changers. It was all right to have the cattle presented for sacrifice inspected, and the foreign money changed that all might offer the half shekel of manhood equality before God, but the sons of Annas had made even this sacred bazaar a "den of thieves."

3. King of our childhood and manhood; of our life in the street and our song in the temple; of our individual and family life in our Bethany, and our social life in our Jerusalem. "Crown him Lord of all." That is consecration, and consecration is simply loyalty to the king by which we are "instant in prayer" and "pray without ceasing."

How hard men have fought against God in the effort to withdraw business and politics and pleasure from His control! But God must rule all our lives. "We can serve Him without condemnation, only without reservation." A story is told of an Indian, penitent for sin and desirous of peace and pardon. He came into the frontier church, and having heard a sermon on consecration came up to the altar and threw down his string of wampum—all he had—saying, "Lord, take poor Indian's wampum, bless poor Indian's soul." But no sense of peace came to his soul. Then he threw down his frontier rifle saying, "Lord, take poor Indian's rifle, bless poor Indian's soul." Still he found no peace. Then he threw himself prostrate at the altar and exclaimed, "Lord, take poor Indian; bless poor month to their wives, for they leave too much to be taken for granted. But a true husband is loyal to his wife all the time, even when too busy to think of her. So love and loyalty to Christ, which are the essence of prayer, may be a perpetual consecration by which we "pray without ceasing."

The Plain People for Christ, the Upper Classes Against Him

The multitude cried Hosanna! The Pharisees exclaimed when the people were crying God save the king, that is, Hosanna, as Christ rode on in majesty, "The world is gone after him." When Ben Tillet was leading the great English dock strike, keeping the men from any outbreaks of disorder, he told the gathered workmen of one whom he called "the Man of Nazareth," who had been a carpenter and became a teacher, and how kind he was to workmen, and what he would no doubt have done had he owned the docks. A sooty-faced workman listened with a tear now and then cleaning a path down his cheeks, as some story of his kindness was narrated, and when Ben Tillet ceased, this workman exclaimed, "I don't know who this Man of Nazareth was you've been telling about, but whoever he was, I move we give him three cheers." And those fellow-workmen gave three cheers for Christ with a will. Gladstone said the educated class, with individual exceptions, has always been the last to welcome moral progress.

The Righteous Severity of the King

Jesus cast out them that sold and bought in the temple. It was the temple bazaar, kept by the sons of Annas, that Jesus banished because of dishonesty in Christ, King of the Children

The children in the temple saying Hosanna. Surely, no religion ever took such a hold of children as that of him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me." The children who had marched beside him with waving palms as he came into the city followed him into the temple so full of enthusiasm they forgot it was the rule of the proud Pharisees that "children should be seen and not heard." When the Pharisees rebuked them, Jesus came to their defense, and praised the children's praises.

He welcomes them not alone to the church building, but into the Church itself. Childhood is the very best time to begin a Christian life. "Childhood is the open gateway; youth, the closing door; age, the barred entrance." Spurgeon said: "I have usually found a clearer knowledge of the Gospel and a warmer love to Christ in the child converts than in the man converts. I will even astonish you still more by saying that I have sometimes met with a deeper spiritual experience in children of ten or twelve than I have in certain persons of fifty or sixty. Capacity for believing exists more in the child than in the man. We grow less, rather than more capable of faith; every year brings the unregenerate mind further away from God, and makes it less capable of receiving the things of God."

The spirit of Christianity speaks in the child of Brooklyn who said, "When I get to heaven I am going to reach down and draw my papa up."

Phillips Brooks once said: "He who helps a child helps humanity with a distinctness, with an immediateness which no other help given to human creatures in any other stage of human life can possibly give again."

POWER OF ONE WORD

A New Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D.

TEXT—Prov. 25: 11 (R.V.): "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in baskets of silver."

A FILIGREE basket loaded with fruit is put before us in the text. What is ordinarily translated "pictures" ought to be "baskets." Here is a silver network basket containing ripe and golden apples, pippins or rennets. You know how such apples glow through the openings of a basket of silver network. You have seen such a basket of fruit on many a table. It whets the appetite as well as regales the vision. Solomon was evidently fond of apples, because he so often speaks of them. While he writes in glowing terms of pomegranates and figs and grapes and mandrakes, he seems to find solace as well as lusciousness in apples, calling out for a supply of them when he says in another place "Comfort me with apples." Now you see the meaning of my text: "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in baskets of silver."

You see the wise man eulogizes just one word. Plenty of recognition has there been for great orations. Cicero's arraignment of Catiline, the philippics of Demosthenes, the five days' argument of Edmund Burke against Warren Hastings, Edward Irving's discourses on the Bible, and libraries full of prolonged utterance, but my text extols the power of one word when it refers to "A word fitly spoken."

This may mean a single word, or a small collection of words—something you can utter in one breath, something that you can compact into one sentence. "A word fitly spoken"—an encouraging word, a kind word, a timely word, a sympathetic word, an appropriate word. I can pass right down the aisle of any church and find between pulpit and front door men whose temporal and eternal destinies have been decided by a word.

An Encouraging Word

I tell you what is a great crisis in every man's history. It is the time when he is entering an occupation or profession. He is opposed by men in middle life, because they do not want any more rivals, and by some of the aged, because they fear being crowded off and their places being taken by younger men. Hear the often severe and unfair examinations of young lawyers by old lawyers, of young doctors by old doctors, of young ministers by old ministers. Hear some of the old merchants talk about the young merchants. Trowels and hammers and scales often are jealous of new trowels and new hammers and new scales. Then it is so difficult to get introduced. How long a time has many a physician had his sign out before he got a call for his services, and the attorney before he got a case! Who wants to risk the life of his family to a young physician who got his diploma only last spring, and who may not know measles from scarlatina, or to risk the obtaining of a verdict for $20,000 to an attorney who only three years ago read the first page of Blackstone?

How is the young merchant to compete with his next-door bargain-maker, who can afford to undersell some things because he can more than make it up by the profit on other things, or has failed three times and had more money after each failure? How is that mechanic to make a livelihood when there are twice as many men in that trade as can in hard times find occupation? There are this very moment thousands of men who are just starting life for themselves, and they need encouragement. Not long harangue, not quotation from profound book—not a page, not a paragraph—but a word, one word, fitly spoken.

Why does not that old merchant, who has been forty years in business, go into that young merchant's store and say "Courage!" He needs only that one word, although, of course, you will illustrate it by telling your own experience, and how long you waited for customers, and how the first two years you lost money, and how the next year, though you did better, illness in your household swamped the surplus with doctor's bills. Why does not that old lawyer go into that young lawyer's office just after he has broken down in making his first plea before a jury and say that word with only two syllables—"Courage!" He needs only that one word, although, of course, you will illustrate it by telling him how you broke down in one of your first cases, and got laughed at by court and bar and jury, and how Disraeli broke down at the start, and how hundreds of the most successful lawyers at the start broke down. Why do not the successful men go right away and tell those who are starting what they went through, and how their notes got protested, and what unfortunate purchases they made, and how they were swindled, but kept right on until they reached the golden milestone? Even some who pretend to favor the new beginner, and say they wish him well, put obstacles in his way.

The Common Need

There are so many men who have all the elements of usefulness and power except one—courage. If you can only under God give them that, you give them everything. In illustrating that one word, show them that every man that ever amounted to anything had terrific struggle. Show him what ships Decatur had to fight, and what a mountain Hannibal had to climb, and what a lame foot Walter Scott had to walk with, and that the greatest poet who ever lived—Milton—was blind, that one of the grandest musicians of all the ages—Beethoven—was deaf, and that Stewart, in some respects the greatest merchant that America ever saw, began in his small store, dining on bread and cheese behind the counter in a snatched interregnum between customers, he opening the store and closing it, sweeping it out with his own broom and being his own errand-boy. Show them that within ten minutes' walk there are stores, shops, and factories, and homes where as brave deeds have been done as those of Leonidas at Thermopylae, as that of Horatius at the bridge, as that of Colin Campbell at Balaklava. Tell them what Napoleon said to his staff officer when that officer declared a certain military attempt to be impossible. "Impossible!" said the great commander. "Impossible is the adjective of fools!"

Show them also that what is true in worldly directions is more true in spiritual directions. Call the roll of prophets, apostles, and martyrs, and private Christians from the time the world began, and ask them to mention one man or woman greatly good or useful who was not depreciated and flailed and made a laughing stock. Racks and prisons and whips and shipwrecks and axes of beheading did their worst, yet the heroes were more than conquerors. With such things you will illustrate that word "courage," and they will go out from your presence to start anew and right, challenging all earth and hell to the combat.

Saved by a Word

"Good-morning! How do you do today?" said a clergyman in New Haven, Conn., many years ago to a stonemason who was covered with dust and mortar. The stonemason was sour with the world and cross and crabbed, but at that salutation of the clergyman, looked up in surprise, and stopped, and asked some one who was passing who that man was who spoke to him so kindly, and was told he was the pastor of a church on that street. The stonemason next Sunday went to that church to hear its pastor preach. The stonemason was converted under the sermon, and prepared for the ministry and became one of the most useful and brilliant and foremost ministers in the Baptist denomination. I heard him in my boyhood say on the anniversary platform in Broadway Tabernacle that that Good-morning on the street of New Haven, many years before, saved him for this world and the next. Oh, the power of a kind word!

That word "courage," fitly spoken with compressed lips and stout grip of the hand and an intelligent flash of the eye—well, the finest apples that ever thumped on the ground in an autumnal orchard, and were placed in the most beautiful basket of silver network before keen appetites, could not be more attractive.

Furthermore,

fitly spoken is a beautiful thing. Only God could give the inventory of sick beds and bereft homes and broken hearts. We ought not to let a day pass without a visit or a letter or a message or a prayer consolatory. You could call five minutes on your way to the factory, you could leave a half hour earlier in the afternoon and fill a mission of solace. You could brighten a sick room with one chrysanthemum. You could put a postscript to a letter that would bring the joys of heaven to a soul. You could send your carriage, and give an afternoon airing to an invalid on a neighboring street. You could loan a book with some chapters most adapted to some particular misfortune. Go home to-day, and make out a list of things you can do that will show sympathetic thoughtfulness for the hardly bested. How many dark places you might illumine! How many tears you could stop, or, if already started, you could wipe away! How much like Jesus Christ you might get to be! So sympathetic was he with beggary, so helpful was he for the fallen, and so stirred was he at the sight of drowsy, epilepsy, paralysis, and ophthalmia, that whether he saw it by the roadside, or at the sea-beach, or at the mineral baths of Bethesda, he offered relief. Cultivate genuine sympathy, Christ-like sympathy. You cannot successfully dramatize it. False sympathy Alexander Pope sketches in two lines:

Before her face her handkerchief she spread,
To hide the flood of tears she did not shed.

There are four or five words which, fitly spoken, might soothe, and emancipate, and rescue. Go to those from whose homes Christ has taken to himself a loved one, and try not under wintry sky, but in eternal spring-tide; not a land where they can be struck with disease, but where the inhabitant never says, "I am sick;" not a reunion that can be followed by separation, but in a place "from which they shall go no more out forever." For emaciation and sighing, immortal health. Reunion, or, if you like the word better, anticipation. There is nothing left for them in this world. Try them with heaven. With a chapter from the great Book open one of the twelve gates. Give them one note of seraphic harp, one flash from the sea of glass, one clatter of the hoofs of the horses on which victors ride. That word reunion, or anticipation, fitly spoken—well, no fruit heaped up in silver baskets could equal it. Of the two thousand kinds of apples that have blessed the world, not one is so mellow, or so rich, or so aromatic; but we take the suggestion of the text, and compare that word of comfort, fitly spoken, to apples of gold in baskets of silver.

So, also, is a word of warning. A ship may sail out of harbor when the sea has not so much as a ripple, but what a foolhardy ship company would they be that made no provision for high winds and wrathful seas. However smoothly the voyage of life may begin we will get rough weather before we harbor on the other side, and we need ever and anon to have some one uttering in most decided tones the word "Beware!" There are all the temptations to make this life everything and to forget that an inch of ground is larger, as compared with the whole earth, than this life as compared with our eternal existence. There are all the temptations of the wine cup and the demijohn, which have taken down as grand men as this or any other century has heard of. There are all the temptations of pride and avarice and base indulgence and ungovernable temper. There is no word we all need oftener to hear than the word "beware."

The trouble is that the warning word is apt to come too late. We allow our friends to be overcome in a fight with some evil habit before we sound an alarm. After a man is all on fire with evil habit your word of warning will have no more effect than would an address to a house on fire, asking it to stop burning, no more use than a steam tug going out to help a ship after it has sunk to the bottom of the ocean. What use in to that inebriate whose wife was dying from wounds inflicted by his own hand. As he held the hand of his dying wife he made this vow: "Mary, I will never take another glass of strong drink until I take it from this hand which I now hold." In an awful way he kept the vow, for when the wife was in her coffin he filled a glass with brandy, put the glass into the dead hand, then took the glass out of her hand, and drank the liquid. Too late does any warning come to such an one. But many a man now high up in usefulness and honor was stopped on the wrong road by a kindly hand put upon the shoulder and a word fitly spoken. Ah, yes! fitly spoken; that is, at the right time, with the right accentuation, with the right emphasis. A dictatorial way, a condemnatory manner, a fault-finding tone of voice, a manner which seems to say, "Look at me, and do as I do," will only make matters worse. From such a reproval the inebriate will go out to take a drink sooner than he would have taken it, and the dissolute man a worse plunge into sin. The word of warning must be charged and surcharged with sympathy. You will practically say to the man: "I suppose you got into your present habit through overwork, and you took stimulus to keep up and do the work you must do." Or, "I suppose it was through illness, and you took an intoxicant first as a medicine," or, "you are a hail-fellow-well-met, and you took the liquid in sociability," or, "you were the representative of a commercial house that expected you to treat customers. I understand it all. If I had been in the same circumstances I would probably be fast in the same thralldom." By some such prepare the way for a "Beware!" that will halt your friend on the wrong road as suddenly as any platoon of soldiers was ever halted. Swing the red lantern across that track, and stop that train before it reaches the chasm!

There must be no impatience in the warning we give others. We must realize, that but for the kindness of God to us we would have been in the same rapids. That man going wrong may be struggling with a tide of evil inherited from father and grandfather and great-grandfather. The present temptation may be the accumulated force of generations and centuries. "No," you say, "his father was a good man; I knew him." But did you know his grandfather? Evil habit is apt to skip one generation, a fact recognized in the Ten Commandments, which speak of the third and fourth generation, but say nothing of the second generation.

Or the man astray may have an unhappy home, and that is enough to wreck any one. We often speak of men who destroy their homes, but do not say anything about the fact that there are thousands of wives in America who by petulance and fretting, and inconsideration and lack of economy, and all manner of disagreeableness, drive their husbands into dissipation. The reason that thousands of men spend their evenings in clubhouses and taverns is because they cannot stand it at home. I know men who are thirty-year martyrs, in the fact that they are awfully married. Without asking divine guidance, they entered into an alliance which ought never to have been made. That is what is the matter with many men you and I know. They may be very brave and heroic and say nothing about it, but all the neighbors know. Now, if the man going wrong has such domestic misfortune, be very lenient and excusatory in your word of warning. The difference between you and him may be that you would have gone down faster than he is going down if you had the same kind of conjugal wretchedness.

Besides that, you had

in your word of warning, for the day may come when you may need some one to be lenient and excusatory to you. There may be somewhere ahead of you a temptation so mighty that unless you have sympathetic treatment you may go under. "Oh, no," says some one, "I am too old for that." How old are you? "Oh," you say, "I have been so long in active business life that I am clear past the latitude of danger." There is a man in Sing Sing penitentiary who was considered the soul of honor until he was fifty years of age, and then committed a dishonesty that startled the entire commercial world. I was on a ship crossing the Atlantic, and all went well from the time we left Liverpool until within a few hours of New York, when, because of some defect of compass, or some lack of fidelity on the part of those responsible, the Nantucket lighthouse suddenly warned us that we were driving straight for the rocks, and the vessel turned in time to save the ship. And many a man has got nearly through the voyage of life in safety, and then gone into the breakers. So you had better not hold your chin too high, as though you were forever independent of all moral disaster. Better, in the way you pronounce your word of warning to those astray, indicate that you yourself have weaknesses that may yet fling you down unless God help you, and that you realize there may be temptations ahead with which you will find it as hard to grapple as the temptations with which that man is grappling.

In mentioning fine arts, people are apt to speak of music and painting and sculpture and architecture, but they forget to mention the finest of all the fine arts—the art of doing good, others, the art of saving men. An art to be studied as you study music, for it is music in the fact that it drives out moral discord and substitutes eternal harmony. An art to be studied like sculpture, for it is sculpture in the fact that it builds a man, not in cold statue, but in immortal shape that will last long after all pentelic marble has crumbled. An art to be studied as you study architecture, for it is architecture in the fact that it builds for him a house of God, eternal in the heavens. But an art that we cannot fully learn unless God helps us. Ourselves saved by grace divine, we can go forth to save others, and with a tenderness and compassion and a pity that we could not otherwise exercise we can pronounce the warning word with magnificent result. The Lord said to the prophet Amos: "Amos, what seest thou?" and he answered: "A basket of summer fruit." But I do not think Amos saw in that basket of summer fruit anything more inviting and luscious than many a saved man has seen in the warning word of some hearty, common-sense Christian adviser, for a word fitly spoken is "like apples of gold in baskets of silver."

The Art of Helping

So, also, is a word of invitation potent and beautiful. Who can describe the drawing power of that word, so small and yet so tremendous, "Come!" It is a short word, but its influence is as long as eternity. Whether calling in wrong direction or right direction, many have found it irresistible. That one word has filled all the places of dissipation and dissoluteness. It is responsible for the abominations that curse the earth. Inquire at the door of prisons what brought the offender there, and at the door of almshouses what brought the pauper there, and at the door of the lost world what was the cause of the incarceration, and if the inmates speak the truth they will say: "The word 'Come!' brought us here." Come and drink.

Come and gamble. Come and sin. Come and die. Pronounce that word with one kind of inflection, and you can hear in it the tolling of all the bells of conflagration and woe.

The chief baker in prison in Pharaoh's time saw in dream something quite different from apples of gold in baskets of silver, for he said to Joseph: "I also was in a dream, and, behold, I had three white baskets on my head, and in the uppermost basket there was all manner of baked meats for Pharaoh, and the birds did eat them out of the baskets upon my head." Joseph interpreted the dream, and said it meant that the chief baker should be beheaded and the birds would eat his flesh. So many a man has in his own bad habits omens of evil that peck at him and foretell doom and death.

But, oh, the power of

when aright uttered! We do well when we send young men into schools and colleges and theological seminaries, and by nine years of instruction and drill hope to prepare them to sound aright that sweet and enrapturing and heaven-descended word "Come!" The Gospel we believe in is a Gospel of "Come!" That word speak all the Churches. That word is now building thrones for conquerors and burnished coronets for kings and queens. That word is to sound so clearly and impressively and divinely that the day is advancing when all nations shall respond, "We come!" "We come!" And while the upper steeples toward God and heaven will be thronged with redeemed souls ascending, there will not be one traveler on the road of sin and death.

In the Kremlin at Moscow, Russia, is what is called the "King of Bells," but it is a ruined bell, and it has rung no sound for near two hundred years. It is sixty-seven feet in circumference, and in height it is more than ten times the height of the average man, and it took a score of men to swing its brazen tongue. It weighs two hundred tons. On the 19th of June, 1706, in a great fire, it fell and broke. It broke at the part which was weakened by the jewels which the ladies of Moscow threw into the liquid metal at the casting. The voices of that bell are forever hushed. It will never ring again, either at wedding or obsequy or coronation. What majestic and overpowering silence! One walks around it full of wonder and historical reminiscence and solemnity. On it are figures in relief representing Czar and Empress and Christ and Mary and the Evangelists. But as I stood before it last summer I bethought myself of a greater bell, and one still ringing. It is the Gospel bell, ages ago hung on the beam of the cross. It has vaster circumference, and with mightier tongue sounds across seas and continents. The jewels of affection thrown into it at its casting by ransomed souls of earth and heaven have not weakened it, but made it stronger and more glorious. Evangelists and apostles rang it, and martyrs lifted their hands through the flames to give it another sounding. It will ring on until all nations hear it and accept its invitation, "Come! come!" It will not fall, as did that of Moscow. No storm can stop it. No earthquake can rock it down. When the fires of the last day blaze into the heavens, amid the crash of mountains and the groan of dying seas, its clear, resounding voice will be heard calling to the last inhabitant of the burning planet, "Come! come!"

But it requires now no great strength to ring that bell. With this weak hand, yesterday formed and to-morrow turned to dust, I lay hold that Gospel bell in invitation to all to whom these words shall come, on whatever land or whatever sea, in high places or low.

I Ring Out the Word,

"Come! come!" Come and have your sorrows solaced. Come and have your wounds healed. Come and have your blindness illumined. Come and have your fatigues rested. Come and have your soul saved. Do you not hear the very last proclamation from the heavens which the seer of Patmos was commissioned to make: "The Spirit and the bride say come, and let him that heareth say come, and let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will let him take the water of life freely?" Aye! hear you not the chime of many Gospel bells in the invitation this moment sounding from the heavens: "Come out from among them and be ye separate," saith the Lord. "And touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and will be a father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters," saith the Lord Almighty. Come and sit down at the King's banquet. Was there ever such a brilliant feast or so many royal guests? Here are the chalices filled, not from the breweries of earth, but with the "new wine of the kingdom." And here are the ripe, purple clusters of Eschol, and pass them around to all the banqueters—"apples of gold in baskets of silver."

THE PREACHING PRINTER

Like Paul, this Self-supporting Missionary Earns a Living by a Trade

FOR more than thirty years Rev. S. J. Liggan, of Lynchburg, Va., has faithfully preached the Gospel of Jesus, although acting at the same time as senior member of a well known printing firm, and working daily with his own hands at the printer's case. After his conversion, many years ago, he felt called to the great work of the ministry, but because of what he felt to be a duty to his family and for other honorable reasons, he could not separate himself from secular employment. Not yielding to discouragement, however, he pursued with energy and efficiency his daily occupation and embraced every opportunity of telling to others the story of Jesus: on the Sabbath he literally went out into the highways and hedges to proclaim the Gospel of the Son of God. His worth was soon recognized by the denomination to which he belonged, and for years he has been an honored member of the Virginia Annual Conference of the M. E. Church.

Rev. S. J. Liggan's work in the ministry has been altogether a labor of love; he has received little or no financial compensation. During the week he confines himself closely to business. On Sunday he goes to some country school-house or small isolated church, sometimes walking many miles to get to his appointment, and preaches morning and night, often on the same day conducting funeral and marriage services. His work in the mountains and destitute places is often greatly blessed; large crowds, eager and appreciative, flock to hear him; the poor and destitute welcome him with open hearts; and many are the conversions that have occurred under his ministry.

The appreciation in his home city is well attested by the fact that he probably performs more marriages than any other minister in town. His printing office is sometimes the scene of a happy wedding.

Although now past three score years of age, he is still vigorous and active, doing his duty at the printer's case, and preaching regularly at five different appointments. Full of reminiscences, he delights to relate his ministerial experiences, the humorous as well as the serious. His marriage fees are often the subject of merry and quaint, though never depreciating, comment. It sometimes happens, that after traveling a long distance to some remote place to unite some couple in holy wedlock, he receives in exchange a bushel of apples, or a few potatoes.

FIVE GENERATIONS

THE Good Book says: "The beauty of old men is the gray head." The silver crown of years is honorable indeed, indicating, as it usually does, that the wearer has been obedient to God and nature's laws, has lived temperately, has accumulated knowledge and wisdom. That many of its people see great length of days speaks well for a nation; and one notes with pleasure that centenarians seem to be on the increase in America. Numbers of letters received at this office from homes where, as writers kindly say, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a beloved and honored guest, show that more people than is commonly supposed are looking down from the vantage of ninety years and more on great-great-grandchildren. The photograph published herewith shows how hale and hearty a man may be who is nearing the century mark. Mr. Jacob Berry, born 1810, in Center county, Pa., married his stateswoman, Susan Landis, 1832. They now live in Berryville, Ill. Samuel, their son, sixty-eight years old, sits on the extreme right in the picture. The lady standing is Sarah, daughter of Samuel; the gentleman beside her is her son, a minister of the Gospel; the little tot is the minister's daughter. The aged head of the family has lived a consistent Christian life; for forty-five years he has been a member of the United Brethren Church; though in his nineties, he will walk several miles now rather than miss attendance on public worship. His household and its branches look up to him for counsel, and that counsel is now, as it ever has been: "Live close to God," and adds this aged saint: "The Lord hath been mindful of us; He will bless the house of Israel; He will bless the house of Aaron."

The New Century

A GREETING to Nineteen Hundred and One, first-born child of the new Century! While others indulge in retrospect, and review with more of sadness than satisfaction the long catalogue of events that have befallen in the century just ended, let it be ours to look ahead, and with the optimistic eye of faith, and with hearts filled with hope, to discern if we may what the young age has in store for ourselves and those to follow after us.

In the remarkable Symposium which appears in another part of this issue, many of the great problems of the new Century are ably discussed by men and women distinguished in their special spheres. Their strong and hopeful words should encourage us to greater zeal and a deeper faith in the wisdom and the goodness of God, whose hand is visible through the centuries, working out the destiny of the race. Along what lines of development may not His providence work in our behalf, in these coming hundred years! We have seen marvels—nay, almost miracles—in the wondrous unfolding of the past, and who shall say that the new age upon which we have just entered may not be marked by still grander progress toward the fulfillment of the Divine purposes.

To all good men and women, the New Century brings a thousand precious hopes, for the realization of which the entire Christian world should strive ceaselessly, with prayer and effort and in confident expectation. Let us hope and work and pray that it may bring wars to an end forever, and usher in that brotherhood of man of which the prophets and the fathers had foregleams; that it may bring the joy of happier days and brighter lives to the great army of the honest poor; that it may introduce that generous spirit of universal conciliation which will adjust the differences that now divide men, causing envy and hatred between brother and brother; that it may purge society from its moral leprosy, cleanse the Augean stables of vice in our great cities, and bring in the era of pure citizenship and upright government; that it may increase the safeguards of the home and the family; that it may curb the giant, Intemperance, and bind him in chains, so that he shall brutalize and slay no more.

And let us not forget to work and pray that the barriers of formality and sectarianism in religion may be broken down and put away forever, and that the multitudes, near and far, may be brought together in the New Century under the banner of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, so that the Kingdom of Love and Peace on earth may be no longer a beautiful dream, but a blessed reality.

Diabolism in College

WHILE the attention of our American Congress is being called to the alleged hazing at West Point, and one of the prominent colleges has become more distinguished by the maltreatment of freshmen by the sophomores, we wish to say that this evil may be stopped, and all institutions are culpable if they do not stop it. The whole subject should be taken out of the realm of jocosity into the court of oyer and terminer. Put a few of those scoundrelly college-students into the penitentiary and the brutality will no more be heard of.

The burning of the throat and stomach of a newly matriculated student by a draught of tabasco sauce, and the fastening of a blindfolded student near a railroad track, giving him the idea that he will be crushed to death by the approaching train of cars, may be great fun for the participants in the scene, but to us who contemplate such behavior it is an infernalism that ought to be driven back to the perdition from which it ascended. The son of an eminent American lawyer, dying from the effect of "hazing" in one of our northern colleges, brought vividly before the country the diabolism to be found in some of our colleges. You quote "Boys will be boys," and you are right, but boys need not be devils. Such behavior implies a cruelty that ought to be punished by disgrace and imprisonment. Such assault is all the more dastardly because it is frequently made upon those not very sharp-witted, or who are accounted "green." The unsophisticated are usually the victims. The cowards we speak of dare not attack those of strong muscle and wide-awake brain. They take advantage of physical weakness or mental lethargy. A half dozen members of a higher class in college called upon a certain student, and by their manner disclosed that they were about to put him under the process of hazing, and he very justly took from his closet a shot-gun, the sight of which adjourned the attempt at "assault and battery" for all time. Let us have plenty of fun for students. There is the ball-ground, and the lawn tennis, and the quoits, and the gymnasium. But for this devilry practiced upon the nerves and brain of young men who have come to be prepared for careers of usefulness, let expulsion from college be the smallest part of the punishment. We invoke for such demeanor constable, Grand Jury and prison wall. Such misdemeanor is not to be classified with what are commonly called "college pranks." While we do not advise them, they do not kindle our indignation but do excite our laughter. When some of those, afterward prominent as lawyers, or doctors, or clergymen, assisted at Princeton or Yale college in transporting a donkey to the top of the stairs, so that the president ascending the stairs met the donkey descending; when the students during the night put a farmer's load of wood on the top of the college building, but on the following day helped the farmer re-load his wagon in the right place; when the college bell had its tongue tied so that it could not call the students to morning prayers, something was done that ought not to have been done. But after all there was no cruelty enacted, and no damage done, save the surprise of the college president, or the detention of the farmer in the sale of his wood, or the late arrival of the students at chapel service. But hazing is atrocity, and we have no doubt that in all the professions and occupations there are those whose nerves never have recovered, and never will recover, from the fright and agitation suffered soon after their initiation in college. There is something awfully wrong in any one who finds amusement in torturing man or beast. Such persons have within them, to greater or less extent, the spirit of murder, and they need to put themselves under the severest suppression. Meanwhile let college faculties and the law of the land join hands in putting an end to this appalling ruffianism. We will await with much interest to find out whether the investigation at West Point discovers that that illustrious institution has been calumniated, or that the charges are true, and if the latter, what are the names of the murderers.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS

Their Power and Privileges

THERE is a tremendous living power in this nation, of which political economists take no account. To them a Sunday School teacher's meeting may not seem a very important national affair, but they would think differently if they considered of whom it consists, and what are its definite objects. For this great body is an absolute spiritual and moral force, working unanimously with a steady pressure in the region which assures the strength and prosperity of the whole nation. Immoral Sunday School teachers could not, for any length of time, keep their office; for they are the teachers of morality, and every one of their associates are sureties for their sincerity.

Though a voluntary association, framing its own laws, and self-regulated in its proceedings, is there any legislative body in the world who would make such an imposing appearance as all the Sunday School teachers of the United States gathered together in one immense building? Ah! no building could contain them, but one from the hand of the Divine Architect—some vast plain, with the mountains in the background, and the sky for a dome.

Very foolish, indeed, would be the statesman who could rate such a body, in any sense, as an unimportant one. Even a political statist, viewing them as mere educators and moral agents, would be a fool to ignore their worth and influence. How many children between the years of seven and fourteen owe all the religious and mental training they ever receive to this vast organization of voluntary teachers? And in a country where every great organization is almost certainly drawn into some political party, it is a wonderful thing to find so vast a body sinking all questions of Democracy or Republicanism in the one great question of teaching the young to be good citizens, independent of party politics.

Another evidence of the deep and great work they are doing, is the touching confidence with which parents surrender their children to the Sunday School. They may have prejudices about secular teachers, doubts and dislikes about secular methods of teaching, but they have an unlimited confidence in the Sunday School. Whether social economists notice this fact or not, it is one of the most extraordinary moral bonds existing in the whole world. And where there is so much bigotry, and jealousy, and passionate feeling about creeds, and churches, and political parties, this blessed neutral ground of the Sunday School is a very truce of God. And this confidence in the parents is duplicated—with a great deal of affection added thereto—in the children. The tie between Sunday School teachers and their scholars is often a very near and dear one; and in a great many cases teachers may assure themselves they have touched souls for good that will answer to that touch even beyond this life.

The good, however, is intensely reciprocal, for in spiritual matters particularly, it is "more blessed to give than to receive," and the teacher tells his own heart this sweet truth continually, as Sabbath follows Sabbath. Nor does his reward rest here; the Sunday School is for all teachers a splendid "course" in the formation and discipline of character. From the control of home and college thousands of young men and women, who have rendered obedience without asking for reasons for obedience, pass into the Sunday School as teachers. Here they find that with obedience to laws, they are expected to unite individual thought and judgment. Conjointly with the effort to do good, they assume the feeling of a deep responsibility; and this very feeling leads them to defer voluntarily to minds more experienced than their own. Thus they again go to school themselves, but in a higher department than any secular college could afford them. Conscientiousness, subordination to authority, love of order and method as essential to effectiveness, these and many other virtues are cultivated in the little republic of the Sunday School, admirably preparing the teacher to be a member of the greater republic of the world.

In addition, the Sunday School teacher acquires, in contact with children, a keen and profound knowledge of character. Those who imagine children furnish no material for such an education are very wide of the mark. And those who think lightly of managing children, of winning the stubborn, interesting the stupid, controlling the vicious, are still further wrong. It is an office that no one can accept without fear and prayer; or if any one does accept without these conditions, they only show forth the fact that they have more presumption than piety. And they are soon discovered and judged; for nearly every child under such care sees very quickly the teacher's weak points, and mentally convicts them of insincerity, or inefficiency. For these "little ones" are great diviners of character, and many of them know intuitively what the teacher only learns by patient observation and experiment.

Children also are natural democrats. Any courting or concession will have to come from the teacher; and for learning how to win souls there is no theological seminary equal to the Sunday School. But when the children are won! who has such loyal subjects? Who has such fervent partisans as the Sunday School teacher? Now, as a mere mental effort, it is a great thing to have fathomed the hearts of half-a-score subtle-sensed boys and girls, and by patient tact and love subdued their will to his own.

Then there is the large amount of self-cultivation the teacher requires. To a great many minds, beginning to teach is beginning to learn. They never really understand a subject until they have explained it to others, in their own words, and this simplification of knowledge is one of the last and best attainments of wisdom. Then, also, they are mentally quickened by the friction of many minds in the Teachers' Meetings. The exchange of views, the attrition of opinions, is an intellectual exercise of the highest order, because it brings to proof and action the immense educational power of self-reliance under the control of Christian deference and obedience.

Truly, then, the Sunday School is a mighty school, not only for the children but for the men and women who enter it; for the advantages pointed out here are only the most obvious ones, there are others more private and individual, only known to the solitary experience, and to the grateful heart, of every loving and conscientious teacher. Teachers of this kind, as a rule, do not trouble themselves much about creeds and dogmas; they say to the children, "God is Love!" and on that foundation they build. Especially is this true of women teachers; and Keble was not far from the truth when he asked:

Where is it mothers learn their love?
In every Church a fountain springs,
O'er which the Eternal Dove,
Hovers on softest wings.

An opportunity to do useful service is put within reach of all our readers. The beautifully printed Gospel of John in Spanish and English, bound in durable leatherette with red edges, may be had from this office at five cents per copy. Following the Gospel, and bound up with it, are a number of Gospel Hymns, also in Spanish and English, including "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "Rock of Ages," "The Ninety and Nine," etc. No more useful gift to Spanish-speaking people at home or for distribution in Cuba could be conceived. On receipt of twenty-five cents, five copies will be sent to Cuba, and an additional copy, free of charge, to the person sending us the money.

WHAT THE NEW CENTURY SHOULD DO FOR HUMANITY

REFORMS WHICH THE CHRISTIAN WORLD SHOULD HOPE FOR, WORK FOR, PRAY FOR, AND EXPECT

MORE important, perhaps, than the summing up of the accomplishments of the Nineteenth Century, is a careful consideration of the foremost tasks of mankind in the Twentieth Century. Looking forward one hundred years, we find that there is work for everybody, in social reform movements, in further scientific development, in educational progress, in municipal improvement, in the purification of politics, in bettering the condition of labor. In the following symposium, comprising a supplement of eight pages—recognized authorities in their respective fields of work, by request of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, have written for our readers their opinions of what the New Century Should Do For Humanity. If the prophecies and hopes here defined are to be realized, they afford a most cheering outlook for the future of the race.

THE OLD GOSPEL FOR THE NEW CENTURY

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK

I BELIEVE that the new century will be better than any that has gone before it. The inventive mind of man is not yet exhausted. The resources of God are almost as yet untouched. New inventions, new discoveries, new treasures from the bowels of the earth, new cosmic forces to be harnessed to the will of man, all await a new century. There will be also, I believe, improvements in the statements of Truth, in the methods of carrying the Gospel into all the world, in the organization of the Church. There will be a broader brotherhood, there will be less sectarian rivalry, and no sectarian bitterness. It will not be thought necessary in the new century to segregate people, young and old, into ranks by themselves, but together they shall go out to fight the Lord's battle or to do the Lord's will. But with all these improvements and with all this progress which I believe the twentieth century will bring, I cannot conceive of any change in the fundamental truths of the Gospel.

The Gospel of Jesus Christ has withstood the changes of far more momentous transition periods than that from the nine-

ANDREW CARNEGIE

What is the most important task of mankind in the Twentieth Century? If you could come back to earth in the year 2000, what one change would you most like to see in human affairs? These two questions were sent to Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who answered as follows:

The Earth freed from its foulest stain the killing of men by men under the name of war.

The Profession of Arms now considered by many the most honorable, then held as one of all ^{human} occupations the most dishonorable

Andrew Carnegie

teenth to the twentieth century. Truths that have stood the test of nineteen centuries, which have survived the persecutions of the early centuries, the midnight of the Middle Ages, the fashionable scepticism of the eighteenth century, and the materialism and worldliness of the nineteenth, are not likely to be overthrown by any revolutions that the twentieth century have in store for us.

In fact, there are most cheering indications that the truths of the Gospel will be established on a firmer foundation than ever, and that in the very near future. Destructive criticism seems to have done its worst. Dr. Hillis declares that its age is past, and that the era of constructive development of Christian truth has begun. Very many share his opinion. Untenable positions have been uncovered, twisted and warped proof-texts have been abandoned, but every fundamental doctrine of the Christian Church has been maintained and is as substantially rooted to-day in the hearts of the Church as ever in the past history of the world. Ignorance may be favorable to credulity, but it is not the mother of intelligent faith.

The coming century will hold, I believe, more strongly than ever to the truths of God's word, because they will be better understood. The great facts of sin and its consequences, the lost estate of man and his salvation only by Jesus Christ, the great truths of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, of the importance of this life as a period of probation and of eternal reward and retribution, of the presence of the Holy Spirit in the world, and of the imperative of the great commission to evangelize all nations, these truths which lie at the base of Christian thinking and Christian activity will, I believe, be more firmly established, and, as a consequence, into all the open doors of the world the Gospel through its devoted followers will make its way, and the twentieth century will be looked back upon by future generations as more bright and golden than any hundred years that have preceded it.

HASTEN THE BROTHERHOOD OF MAN

BY WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN

THERE are many reforms which I hope to see realized during the new century. I suggest a question which ought to receive more attention during the coming century than it has during the last few years, namely: How can the coming of the brotherhood of man be hastened by those who acknowledge the Fatherhood of God? Love of God can best be shown by the exhibition of a brotherly love broad enough to include all of God's creatures. The Bible denounces as a liar the man who says that he loves God and yet hates his brother.

I can conceive of no greater reform than that which would apply the eleventh commandment: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," to all phases of human experience. It would put an end to injustice, whether practiced on a small scale by individuals or on a large scale through the operation of bad laws.

CONTROLLING THE DRINK TRAFFIC IN THE NEW CENTURY

THE END OF SALOON POWER

BY WILLIAM WARDWELL

I AM not anticipating reforms in the liquor traffic in the new century, and am not interested in its control in this century or the next. I am striving only to outlaw and destroy it. However difficult and remote this may seem, it is at least possible, but the traffic has come to have such power over political parties, over legislation and public opinion, that control in any large sense is, in my judgment, absolutely and definitely impossible.

Does any one doubt this? Let him test it by making an effort this winter to reform, in the interests of decency and all that pertains to public morals, the vilest combination of saloon and house of ill-fame ever legalized or tolerated in this State, the Raines Law Hotel. Call a public meeting for this purpose; a few reformers and "fanatics" will attend, but not a single business man or representative citizen will be present. The meeting will pass resolutions to be presented to the Legislature, a committee of which will grant him a hearing and proceed promptly and with scant courtesy to "turn him down," and rightly, as he can bring no evidence of public sentiment in favor of such reform. Test it by seeking to close one saloon or to curtail its influence and power, and he will find the whole traffic solidly united to defeat him, and the traffic will succeed. After a few experiences of this kind he will, I am sure, become convinced that to destroy is more feasible and possible than to control, and will not waste time and energy in useless efforts.

And why should not the liquor traffic be destroyed? Why should the saloon be permitted to exist? Is it not absolutely a bad thing, debasing and ruining the individual, wrecking homes and spreading misery wherever its influence extends?

Professor Landois, one of the most eminent German physiologists, whose works are translated into all languages, and now used in every school of medicine, in his latest edition of 1899, says: "Alcohol acts in small quantities as a stimulant, in larger quantities as over stimulant, thereby paralyzing the nervous system. Through the former, it is capable of exciting the energies of the body through a short illness, but in every instance it causes a loss through later relaxation of all the muscles."

The highest authority in this country, the United States Supreme Court, condemns this traffic, as shown in the following quotations from its decisions: "Nor can we ignore the fact established by statistics accessible to everyone, that the disorder, pauperism and crime prevalent in the country are in large measure directly traceable to this evil." Again, its "use as a beverage is hurtful to society and to every member of it, and is therefore a business in which no one may lawfully engage in any way."

We enter upon the new century with renewed hope and with an unwavering faith in the triumph of right, and therefore the ultimate destruction of this curse in our own and other lands.

SUPPRESSION BETTER THAN CONTROL

BY DR. ISAAC K. FUNK

THE Liquor Traffic never gave us so much crime and so much misery as to-day. In 1840 the consumption of alcoholic beverages in the United States was three and a half gallons per capita; in 1860 five gallons; in 1883, nine gallons; last year sixteen gallons. As M. Thiers said to the Ministry of Napoleon, we say to the Liquor Traffic, "You are committing every possible crime." There is in the air to-day the prelude of a mighty change in all that pertains to social welfare.

What shall be the plan of campaign against this evil for the coming century? Prohibition absolute. The saloon is a murderer, and "no murderer hath eternal life." It must die. There can be no compromise with murder. Use tact? Yes. Conquer by replacing? Yes. But never by any kind of compromise.

We should not continue the serious mistake that has been made in attempting restriction along permissive lines. Restriction should be along prohibitive lines. If we are ready to close saloons on Sunday, and at midnight, and on Election days, let us say henceforth, "Any man who sells liquor on Sunday, or after midnight, or on Election days, shall be punished." Heretofore, we have said, "A man can have the privilege to sell liquor except on Sunday, etc."

The license system must end. The Raines Law has brought into our New York State and Municipal Treasuries, in the last five years, $60,788,856, and the result is a carnival of crime such as we have never known before in the city of New York. For the first time in three hundred years we have legalized the right to sell liquor on the Sabbath Day. The universe would fall into chaos and the stars be ground to dust if they did not obey the laws of Almighty God. How do we expect to escape when we authorize the violation of the laws of this same God for so much cash in hand? There can be no other policy for the twentieth century than absolute, unconditional prohibition.

THE CHURCH AGAINST THE SALOON

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY

THE law is the public conscience, and to purge it of the wrong of being accessory to the liquor crime is the greatest question for the twentieth century. An accomplice cannot hope to reform his accomplices. Herein is the strength of the Prohibition party: it has come out from among the friends and servants of the liquor traffic. It does not touch the unclean thing. Whether it can force the conscience issue does not yet appear, but it is fit to work at it. The Church has declared the true doctrine on the subject substantially in these words: "The liquor traffic can never be licensed without sin, and no political party is entitled to expect, nor ought it to receive the vote of a Christian man, so long as it stands committed to the license policy, or refuses to put itself on record in an attitude of open hostility to the saloon."

WATER A SUBSTITUTE FOR ALCOHOL

BY A. W. WAGNALLS

I AM asked what reforms should the new century bring in the liquor traffic? The occasioning cause of the traffic is for the quenching of a great, intensifying thirst. Every victim knows of this. It overrides every obstacle. Thirst implies a fever, a fire in the blood, and the real cause of this pernicious fever is in the social evil that exists in almost every home. Space prevents giving corroborative testimony, and the nature of the subject is too repulsive for extensive elaboration.

The present efforts at reform are in the direction of restriction and prohibition. Both are well meant and have my considerate sympathy. For the new century a broader and more general reform by substitution is suggested. Our Indians, who are so close to nature, aptly name alcohol as "fire-water." It is this liquid fire our burning victims are using to alleviate their torments. But such adds fury to the flames. The conflagration requires immediate attention; it must be put out. This fire is to be quenched by its elemental opposite—water. How? By the systematic drinking of water. How much? When? A full gallon, every day. What kind? Warm water preferably to hot or cold. By whom? Every one. To per as well as total abstainer. Physicians are beginning to recognize the great value of the daily systematic drinking of water in large quantities by the sick as well as those in health. Every one needs to learn that by thus daily flushing every organ, limb, nook and cranny of the body, health, clear brain, and longer life are sure to follow.

This method, however, is for the more immediate effect; the relatively temporary quenching of the fire. Water alone will not do all. The sour grapes our fathers will continue to eat, unless there is a complete reformation through right thinking and right conduct. The pulpit will need teach the dynamic law of thought, as affecting the soul and body. This law operates absolutely, minutely and inevitably. It accounts for the not-to-be-named abominations practiced by our parents, the fruits of which are the saloon and the brothel with all their train of evils. In short, the reforms that the new century should bring in the liquor traffic are: First, restriction by substitution, warm water drinking; and second, and above all things else in the list, prohibition by self-enforcing law; third, dynamic spiritual thinking, and actions to correspond—these mean success.

.. .. SHALL THE NEW CENTURY SEE US A WORLD-POWER?

BY SPENCER TRASK

"WHAT reforms should the new century bring?" is a question so comprehensive, that one hesitates as his mind endeavors to grasp what might result in benefit to mankind, if what should be done, could be done. Not only are we entering upon a new century, but as a people we are entering upon a new phase of national existence. Until within the last few years we have been an almost isolated community. Occupied in the development of our own vast resources, absorbed in our own political and social life, the strikes, upheavals and changes in other nations have not affected us, except incidentally, or as they may have contributed to our growth. Suddenly we find ourselves a world power. We are called to take part in the council of the nations; the destiny of older civilization and people may depend upon our voice and influence.

What position are we to assume in view of these greater responsibilities? From being a debtor, we have become more or less a creditor nation. From an importing nation, we have become an exporting one; for the four years ending June 30, 1900, our exports have exceeded our imports by over two thousand million dollars. These results have been attained in spite of many obstacles and false theories.

The currency question involving also the permanency of the gold standard, has been a disturbing factor for many years. The recent election is now generally believed to have settled the currency question for all time.

For years protection and free trade have been the principal issues between the two great parties struggling for the possession of the government. The last two elections have been won by the Republican party not on the issue of protection, but in spite of it, since many free traders voted with it, believing for the moment the financial question the more important. It is gradually dawning upon the minds of the most bigoted that we cannot become a world-power, adopt the world's gold standard and seek its trade, force its markets and advocate "the open door," and at the same time hold the theory of protection—which is isolation something worse than a Chinese wall of exclusion.

Never in the history of the world has the future given a more inspiring and promising call to a nation to go forth and supply the wants and needs of the whole world than is now given to us. We have within our borders more of the requisites than any other country—vast deposits of mineral ores, unbounded stretches of fertile fields, intelligent workmen, men of inventive genius and executive ability, boundless wealth, courage, enthusiasm.

It requires no great stretch of the imagination to see our country, with a revival of ship-building, such as has been gradually going on in the past few years, regaining its former position as a carrier as well as a producer of the world's products—and this without any assistance of a Ship-Subsidy Bill. Before the coming century has half run its course, New York will be the financial center of the world as London now is, and our ships should cover the seas. What is to prevent us making the world our own? It is not to be won by destructive war, relic of barbarism and of heartlessness—but by bringing to them the products of peaceful labor, enriching their lives, ennobling their minds, educating and elevating man's higher nature. This is a nation we can do if we live up to our higher ideals, and seek to be worthy of the great inheritance that has come to us from our fathers.

.. LABOR'S OUTLOOK IN THE NEW CENTURY ..

BETTER TIMES FOR THE WORKINGMAN

BY EDWIN MARKHAM

THE following questions were sent to Mr. Edwin Markham, at his home in Brooklyn, who wrote the answers specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The lines quoted in two or three of the questions are from Mr. Markham's collected poems, published by Doubleday, Page & Co., entitled "The Man With the Hoe and Other Poems."

1. On what questions should all branches of labor unite for the good of the country?

On the reduction of hours of labor per day; on compulsory arbitration; on the study, from humane motives, of the co-operative ideal in industry.

2. In what way, or toward what end, should labor utilize its gigantic strength?

They should resolutely will to come into harmony and unity of aim and aspiration: they should make appeal through the ballot box for an enlargement of the rights of man. They should strive to so organize the world as to keep open the gates of opportunity.

3. What opportunities should the new century bring to the workingman?

Security in his work, and sufficient leisure from his work to give him time to cultivate his moral and aesthetic nature.

4. What effect, in your opinion, will great combinations of wealth have upon the workingman of the future?

—will concentration of wealth, trusts, etc., prove a benefit or a drawback to the workingman's progress.

Great combinations of wealth will tend to make great counter combinations among the working classes. Trusts will be a decided drawback to the workingman's progress unless some means shall be found to make them serve the good of the whole people, as now they serve the good of a very few.

5. To what degree should the workingman be made a partner of wealth?

If I understand your question, he should be made a full partner. In other words, he should receive as nearly as possible the full value of the things he makes or does.

6. In one of your poems, "The Man Under the Stone," you compare a workingman to a man going through life pushing a great stone always up hill. What is the workingman's real burden—what is the real stone in his up-hill life?

That great stone is his unequal struggle for bread to-day, still further weighted with the fear of penury to-morrow and the dread of a destitute old age. All this, of course, springs out of the narrow margin of scant wage and precarious employment.

7. What kind of help, aside from higher wages, does the laboring man need?

He needs the contented mind that comes from security in his work and joy in his work. This necessarily carries the idea that he must have more leisure and more culture.

8. What would most help to lighten the toiler's burden?

Cooperation, in the place of competition, in the industrial world. Cooperation is the logic of Christianity.

9. How can the Government best help the workingman?

As a first step, by assuming control of railroads, telegraphs, etc., and so moving wisely on toward government ownership of all industries which in private hands have become a menace to the public good and the public safety.

10. What should be done with the idle millions? with the great army of men who want work and yet can find nothing to do?

As first steps, they might well be employed by cities and States, at living wages, upon public works. If enough work of that kind is not forthcoming, let the public powers establish shipyards and other industries sufficient in number to employ the willing hands. Of course, if we had a more effective organization of industry, working time for the now idle could be found by cutting down the excessive hours at present forced upon the overworked. Keep cutting down the hours of the day's work until everyone has work.

11. Are strikes, which are really battles between workman and employer, helpful or harmful to the toiler?

As a rule, they are harmful to the toiler. But at times they seem to be cruel necessities.

12. Would the toiler benefit if, instead of striking, he submitted his grievances to the general Government or to a Labor Department, regulated by law and having a Minister of Labor in the President's Cabinet? Would not this be a better way for the workingman, for the settlement of differences between employer and employed?

Yes, labor should be represented in the Cabinet by an intelligent laborer; not by a parlor farmer, nor by a retired capitalist. The method you suggest of settling strikes would be a decided improvement upon the present hap-hazard plan.

13. "Their blind feet drift in the darkness, and no one is leading." What kind of leaders do the toilers need?

They need

leaders with the white purity of a St. Francis and the iron resolution of a Cromwell, leaders whose watchword shall be "God and the People!" Such men were Joseph Mazzini and John Ruskin.

14. How can the Church best help the "brother to the ox?" How reach him, lift him up?

By studying the anxious problems of economics and finding a way of applying the Golden Rule to industry.

15. And workingwomen? Have we a "sister to the ox?" How should she be reached, uplifted—her burden lightened?

Yes, we have a "sister to the ox." Men and women rise and fall together. In general, the same means that will lift and lighten man's burden will alleviate woman's also.

16. Do Churches and church workers neglect the working people? Do they pay enough attention to factory centers and great industrial towns?

No, Churches do not give enough attention to these matters. Indeed, the burning question in each Church to-day should be the social problem. The saving of men's souls is very closely connected with the amelioration of their social and industrial conditions. The Church needs a new baptism of the Holy Spirit, which is the same as saying, Social Spirit.

COLONIZATION FOR THE IDLE MILLIONS

BY COMMANDER BOOTH-TUCKER

THE very expression, "Idle Millions," sends a shudder through the heart of any thinking man. Is it possible that with all the marvelous advances made by science in every realm of thought and enterprise, we have not yet solved the initial problem of socioculture—the employment of the unemployed in a humane and remunerative manner? The fact is there, staring us in the face—idle millions standing in the world's market places, where the throb of trade and hum of commerce constitute one ceaseless whirl of activity and continuous progress.

See how door after door of opportunity has closed against the idle millions, through no fault of their own. The avenues of remunerative work are choked with a busy swarm of toilers, who, like a herd of stamped cattle, gore and trample each other to death in the wild rush for the waters—not of wealth, but of existence, even of very life itself.

There is a remedy—so simple, so natural, so feasible, that the amazing point is that society has taken so long about its consideration and adoption. Let these idle millions be planted upon the vast tracts of idle land by means of the enormous aggregation of idle capital, which can in these days be so easily commanded for any given purpose on which a nation may set its heart, and the problem has been solved. The fallacies that they will not go, that they will not stay, that they will not work, that they will not pay, have been exploded by the land colonies which we have already established in this country. We have unquestionably demonstrated that under proper management and suitable conditions, there is no more attractive and feasible form of philanthropy, and none that will more surely repay the capital as well as toil expended on it. Those who have visited the Salvation Army colonies have been unanimous in their testimony as to the practicability of the plan of placing "the landless man on the manless land," as it has been epigrammatically expressed by one of our great writers.

EDWIN MARKHAM

If we stretch out to the idle millions the warm, loving hands, not of charity but of remunerative employment, in the establishment of homes of which they shall be the happy owners, we shall provide a market for our commerce, new avenues of industry for our city population, an ornament to our nation and an object-lesson to the world, by converting our idle millions into our best and most trusted citizens.

ARBITRATION REMAINS LABOR'S HOPE

BY W. STAINSBY, CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF LABOR OF NEW JERSEY

YOU ask for my views on the reforms which the new century should bring into the world of labor, especially as to the establishment of labor courts, the abolition of strikes, and the addition to the President's Cabinet of a Secretary of Labor. The general discontent now prevailing throughout the world among those who may be designated the working classes, would seem to indicate the necessity of such reforms in the relations of employer and employee as will make each better acquainted with the aspirations, responsibilities and difficulties of the other.

I believe in arbitration as a means of settling labor disputes after the principals have failed to adjust their difficulties themselves. Indeed, it is only in that way that any just settlement may be effected. When a dispute becomes so intense as to verge on a strike, the principals are of all persons the least competent to get at the merits of it, and determine which side is right; it is only an impartial third party who can do that. The public interests require that all such disputes should be arbitrated, and the side refusing to submit its case for settlement in that way ought to receive the severest censure that public opinion can inflict.

Many of our States have enacted laws establishing Boards of Arbitration in the interest of the public, but the results of their works seem much below what was expected from them. The failure is generally attributed to the fact that their power is simply advisory; offers of mediation by them are frequently rejected by one or both of the parties to a labor dispute. To give these Boards authority to intervene, regardless of what the principals might desire, with the same authority to enforce decisions which the courts possess, would seem to be the only way of making their work effective. As a theory, such a course would seem to be free from any serious objection; it would only be necessary to find out the right of the matter in dispute, which might be wholly on one side, or partly on both, and decide accordingly; but if the findings should not be acquiesced in by the party in fault, then how would the public regard the measures which must necessarily be taken to enforce them. Assuming the cause of trouble to be the discharge of some workmen by an employer, and that the court, finding the reasons given for dismissal not satisfactory, should order them restored to their places. The employer has no choice between taking back men he does not want in his employ and whom he has already discharged, or incurring the penalty of contempt of the court, which could be no other than fine, and if persisted in, imprisonment.

There are at the present time many instances of labor disputes having been satisfactorily settled by volunteer arbitrators, in whose hands both sides were willing to leave their cause. The intelligence, good judgment, and high personal character of these men being regarded as sufficient guarantee that the conclusions reached by them, no matter which side was favored, would be just and equitable.

"God is invisible, and the Czar is far off" is a proverb among the Russian peasantry, eloquently expressive of wrongs inflicted by irresponsible underlings; the pathetic note running through it finds an echo in the heart of many an American workman, from whom the president or other supreme officer of the corporation that employs him, is as "far off" as is the Russian autocrat from the peasant.

To remedy these things, I believe that every corporation should have sitting at its council board, on perfectly equal terms with the other directors, a representative man who would particularly represent the interests of labor, and see to it that in shaping its policy due consideration be given to them. This representation should be based on stock which the corporation might place within reach of their workmen, on terms adjusted to their means, and which they should be encouraged to buy. He would then have a means of making his wants known and adjusting his grievances without resorting to strikes, and this, I believe, would be of infinitely greater advantage to him and to the public, than the appointment by the President of a Secretary of Labor in the Cabinet of the chief executive of the nation.

.. WOMAN'S OUTLOOK IN THE NEW CENTURY ..

GIVE WOMAN HER RIGHTFUL PLACE

BY ELIZABETH CADY STANTON

EVER and anon public thought is aroused on the question of vice in cities. Though an aroused public sentiment can repress the evils for a time in one locality, they reappear at once with renewed energy in many others. Occasionally church officials make their protests, but no one seems to understand the hidden cause of all these terrible outrages.

The authorities of the Episcopal Church are just now fully aroused to action. The first step to be taken is to teach woman a greater self-respect and the rising generation a more profound reverence for her. So long as we assign to her an inferior position in the scale of being; one unfit to stand in the "Holy of Holies" in cathedrals; to take a seat as delegate in a synod, general assembly or conference; to be ordained to preach the Gospel or administer the sacraments—so long will the degradation and dependence of woman continue!

All our efforts to suppress vice are hopeless until woman is recognized in the Canon law and all church discipline, as equal in goodness, grace and dignity with bishops, archbishops—yea, with all who are called the head of the Church.

Our sons in the law schools do not rise from their studies of the invidious statutes and opinions of jurists in regard to women with a higher respect for them. Our sons in theological seminaries do not rise from queens who were greater than the kings who preceded or followed them.

Woman's capacity is beyond dispute, and, if this be granted, there can be no doubt of her ability to bear the burdens and responsibilities of government. And no woman will ever be elevated to high official position, unless she has shown herself at least the peer of those who now hold such places.

WOMAN IN TRADE, THE ARMY AND POLITICS

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD

IN the future, as in the past, there will doubtless be some women who will cultivate the mercantile spirit, and they can claim the example of Mrs. Hetty Green, who has turned one million into many millions. And while it does not at all follow that they need to be eccentric or notorious or niggardly in doing it, it is certain that they will do it better, and to nobler ends by reason of the training received all over the country in the schools and colleges of to-day.

The bad habit of dependence, if not subjection, which until lately has been encouraged in women, has hindered their inventive development. But it is likely that the superior effect of the modern methods, the self-dependence fostered, will increase the inventive quality, and that the manual training given in schools will have taught the use of tools, and the old joke of the woman and the hammer will have lost its clinch. If they can never enter trades requiring muscular strength, they can enter those that do not require so much, as many men do. The enlargement also of the intellectual powers, must of course find play in the professions, and women have already demonstrated their value as lawyers, as physicians, helped by feminine tenderness, as ministers, to whom the long cultivation of the spiritual nature through generation after generation lends an added heavenly grace.

It is often quoted as an argument against the advancement of women that they cannot fight, as if there were nothing in the world to do but to fight, as if, indeed, all men could fight.

There is an ample field for women in connection with the army, in the commissary and sanitary and hospital departments, quite as important as any other service. And it should be remembered that when responsibility is brought home to women there will be much less fighting than there is in these days.

And in conclusion, may I not say that while those concerned in our country's welfare are urging the cultivated and refined among men to go into politics, it would seem that the presence of women in politics could not be otherwise than beneficial to the country.

WOMAN AN ACTIVE WORKER IN THE CHURCH

BY GRACE GREENWOOD (MRS. LIPPINCOTT)

IT is one of the consolations of age that I can look back to almost the beginning of the wonderful progress of woman toward what Stuart Mill calls her "emancipation." Some of our hopeful, stout-hearted workers believe themselves working toward entire emancipation from the old-time tyrannies of custom and prejudice, toward political, moral, social and legal equality. It is a happy, second-sight vision, but my heart tells me that such a blessed period in the history of humanity will never arrive without spiritual aid—without the alliance of religious faith and forces. I believe that, first of all, woman should be allowed her true power and position in the Protestant Church. When I was a child I heard frequently of a famous woman minister, in a neighboring Methodist Church, under whose fervid preaching old men sat gladly, while among the "sisters" of other congregations of the same liberal denomination were many eloquent exhorters. Woman has not kept pace in advance with man in secular fields. Many good women in the church are allowed to do the greater part of its charity and missionary work, but it is not enough. Many a woman sits silent and apart in your conferences and prayer meetings, who has a treasure all unsuspected locked in her devout soul—a passionate, persuasive eloquence, that might draw many disciples to the Master—and who is gifted with a power of "fervent, effectual prayer" that might lift your sinking and world-burdened souls upward and heavenward as on mighty wings.

"The Female Prayer-meeting" is doubtless a good influence and agency, as are all forms of "female" religious meetings, but they are by no means sufficient for the well-being of women of the church, and the complete development of the Christian character and energies. If you do not look forward to a divided heaven, you should begin now to work for cooperation, introduction, equality. In church organizations woman has been robbed of "the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free."

WOMAN'S ADVANCEMENT IN THE PROFESSIONS

BY BELVA A. LOCKWOOD

WOMAN'S introduction into the business world was a necessity, fostered by education, that has resulted in the industrial independence of a very large class of American women. All classes and grades of work are to-day the result of skilled machinery instead of skilled handiwork. Skilled machinery must be operated by skilled minds, in which, to a very large extent, sex does not enter. In all of the prairie States of the West, where the farming is done by machinery, the women can do the plowing and reaping as well as the men. They have won a power in this industrial independence that has lifted them out of tutelage. We are no longer educating girls to get married, but are training them like the boy to trades and professions. In the business future of the country there will be a rivalry between men and women for preferment, but heavy contracts, large ventures, and business requiring large capital, and intricate problems and long experience will be for the next half century in the hands of men.

The professions have been opened to woman, and she has succeeded in them to a degree that will form a precedent for those who come after, so that the number of women lawyers, doctors, and ministers will increase for each successive year. Already the woman doctor has become a necessity for every considerable town, and she is welcomed in all of the countries of the Orient, where the seclusion of women has been for centuries past the custom of the people.

The advent of women into the real political life of the country has been mostly confined to the new States of the West, but women politicians will increase and multiply as the years roll on, and they will gradually occupy higher places. Wu Ting-fang, the very astute Chinese Minister to this country, who has been much interested in noting our progressive women, said to me, "I believe that some day the United States will have a woman President, but they must first become Cabinet Ministers." I think, however, that to succeed politically women must go into the primaries, be sent as delegates to the nominating conventions, and talk and write in the political campaigns. Nor will this progress lead to the degradation of women as has been feared.

WOMAN'S FUTURE JUDGED BY THE PRESENT

BY KATE TANNATT WOODS

WOMAN'S future in business depends not only upon her tact, but her environment. At the present time, women are competing with men against heavy odds. Men milliners, dress-makers, and shopkeepers do not as a rule make her business life easy. In the professions she has already accomplished much and is destined to do far more. In the pulpit, she is justly honored; in law, she is trusted and encouraged; while in medicine, despite some opposition in the past, she is doing a grand work, which cannot be measured by dry statistics. Her executive faculties are steadily developing as occasion demands, while her management of large organizations has commanded the admiration of statesmen and political leaders.

As a rule, the progressive West offers better opportunities to women than our more conservative East. More women are employed in banks, one lady having the reputation in Illinois several years since of being "a superior bank president." In the State of Washington a woman was first employed as "clerk of the Senate." As librarians women are fast forging to the front and are doing excellent work.

In literature her efforts have been most successful in weeding out the "goody good trash" formerly offered to the young, and her genuine dislike of cant and hypocrisy will do still more in the future; it will aid in overcoming the sensational tendency now so disastrous to legitimate literary work. All this means better wives, wiser fathers, more intelligent mothers, happier spinsters, and a better world, through the general uplifting of our social and spiritual forces.

their studies of the Bible, and the popular commentaries on the passages of Scripture concerning woman's creation and position in the scale of being, with an added respect for the mothers who went to the very gates of death to give them life and immortality.

Just as long as the Church and the State continue to make woman an outcast she will be the sport of the multitude. If the same respect the masses are educated to feel for cathedrals, altars, symbols and sacraments was extended to the mothers of the race, as it should be, all these problems would be settled.

WOMAN TO BECOME THE PEER OF MAN

BY LILLIE DEVEREUX BLAKE

DESPITE the fact that women have through the Christian centuries been condemned to positions of inferiority, when happy conditions or strange accidents have given to fine specimens of their sex the opportunity to show their ability, they have proved their superiority in innumerable instances. The armies of Israel were led to victory by Deborah, when Barak lacked the energy to continue the contest. The armies of France were led by Joan of Arc, when the French generals had met only defeat. Elizabeth of England, Maria Theresa of Austria, Catherine the Great of Russia, are familiar examples of

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE in the NEW CENTURY

RECKLESS MARRIAGES SHOULD BE PREVENTED

BY BISHOP SAMUEL J. FALLOWS, REFORMED CHURCH OF ILLINOIS.

THE new century should be characterized, in its earliest periods, by the passage of uniform and just divorce laws by the several States. Whether Congress has the power to pass a constitutional law prescribing the same conditions for obtaining divorce in all the States is an open question. Eminent authorities do not agree upon the subject. Commissions of lawyers have been appointed at different times to urge uniformity of action by the various State Legislatures. Little, however, has thus far been accomplished toward that end in any State.

In all the States, except South Carolina, which has no divorce laws, the violation of the marriage vow is an absolute cause for divorce.

In nearly all the States, physical incapacity is a cause, so is wilful desertion. The time of such wilful desertion varies from six months in Arizona, to one year in twenty States, to two years in ten States, to three years in eleven States and to five years in three other States. Habitual drunkenness is a cause in all but ten States. "Imprisonment for felony," or "conviction for felony" is a cause in all the States and territories except six.

Cruel, abusive treatment, intolerable cruelty, extreme cruelty, repeated cruelty are causes in all the States except seven.

Failure to provide by the husband is a cause, the time varying from six months in Arizona, to one year in six States, to two years in Indiana and to three years in Delaware. No time is specified in the remainder of the States.

Fraud and fraudulent contract are causes in nine States.

Absence without being heard from is a cause, varying from three years in some of the States to seven in others. Voluntary separation for five years is a cause in Wisconsin.

Ungovernable temper, outrages, or excesses, and the like, are causes in a large number of the States.

Insanity, idiocy at the time of marriage, incurable insanity, are causes in several States.

In different States, other causes include notorious immorality of the husband before marriage but unknown to the wife; when the husband is a fugitive from justice; any gross neglect of duty; inability of husband and wife to live in peace and union; vagrancy of the husband, etc.

Previous residence for divorce varies from six months in six States, to one year in thirty-six States and territories, and three years in three other States.

In the State of New York absolute divorce is granted only for adultery.

The ratio of divorces to marriages varies from one to six in some of the States, to an average of one to thirteen or fourteen in other States.

In Cook county, in which Chicago is situated, the number of default divorce cases, that is cases where only one side is heard, is nine times that of the cases where both parties are present in court. About five or six minutes is the average time spent in hearing each case.

Three thousand courts, according to the Government statistics, are granting divorces in the United States.

In 1890 these courts dissolved the marriage relation in 35,000 cases. From 1867 to 1886 they granted 328,716 divorces. The number of children affected by these proceedings, according to the records, was 267,739. Multitudes of other children were not included in this number.

BISHOP FALLOWS

JUDGE DAVID MCADAM

FREDERICK R. COUDERT

The laws should be uniform throughout the country, as I have stated. As a churchman I might insist on one cause only for divorce—marital infidelity. But marriage is a civil contract as well as a religious ceremony. The State has the right to prescribe other causes. But they ought to be of a grave and serious character.

Christians must aim to prevent reckless marriages. They must help devise stricter methods of legal administration. They must strive to end the anomaly of a man's having a wife in one State who is not his wife in another, where he may reside.

A NATIONAL DIVORCE LAW WOULD END BIGAMY

BY JUDGE DAVID MCADAM, OF THE NEW YORK SUPREME COURT

YOU ask me what reforms should the new century bring in the matter of the Divorce Law—should we not have a uniform and just national Divorce Law? After considering all points, I find that the question merits an emphatic affirmative. The present condition of affairs with reference to divorce is deplorable. We have now forty-five States, all of which (excepting South Carolina, in which divorces are not granted) have legislated differently upon this branch of the law of domestic relations. The legislation would not be so injurious in its consequences if the divorces authorized were confined to cases where both parties to the marriage actually resided within the State where the proceedings were instituted, so that actual service of process might be made within the jurisdiction of the State court. Such a decree, process having been personally served on the defendant within the State, is valid everywhere.

A uniform and just national Divorce Law would work a real reform. To enable Congress to pass such a law it would be necessary to amend the federal constitucognizant by the federal authorities, so as to punish a party who, having committed bigamy in Canada or any other foreign country, lives in this country with the spurious wife. As a result of such national legislation there would be few bigamists in the country, and many here now might find good cause to migrate to other climes.

A CONSERVATIVE VIEW OF UNIFORM DIVORCE LAWS

BY FREDERICK R. COUDERT

SEVERAL weighty arguments might be presented in favor of congressional legislation upon the subject of a uniform divorce law in all States. It certainly is unfortunate that a divorce regularly obtained in one State from a competent court should fail of its effect in another, and that a man or a woman should be a husband or wife in New York and a single man or woman in Dakota or Nebraska. This, at least, is one of the troubles that might be removed by national legislation.

But is there not much to be said on the other side? I may frankly say, at the risk of impairing any regard that your readers may have for my opinion, that the way to deal with divorce laws would be to abrogate them in toto. The interests of society at large are paramount. Our sympathies are not always judicious advisers; the relief given to individuals is often a curse upon society.

While the national law would thus remedy one great inconvenience at least, we should inquire in advance of acting what kind of law we are likely to secure from Congress. The State of New York has upon this subject been very conservative, and has only granted divorces in extreme cases. Most of our citizens of New York would be of opinion that if the national law which many desire is still farther to relax the marriage tie, it were best to allow things to remain as they are rather than to fly into the arms of unknown evils. Surely it would not be an advantage to citizens of New York to have the legislation of these States made the law here. It would save expense in individual cases, no doubt, as it would be easier to employ an attorney in this city, and less expensive, than to resort to professional service a thousand or two thousand miles away. Possibly many are only deterred from breaking up their present home by the expense. Why reduce the cost of matrimonial separation far below the present tariff of disbursements? On the whole, in the ignorance of what law we might get from Congress, assuming that it would be inferior to our own, I am inclined to think that, unsatisfactory as the condition of things now is, it is safer to keep it out of national legislation.

POPULAR ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS

BY U. S. SENATOR JOHN M. THURSTON.

GENERAL interest and discussion, both in and out of Congress, have been aroused by the question of the election of United States Senators by popular vote, and some of the senatorial contests of the last few years have appealed strongly to the popular judgment in favor of an amendment of our Constitution permitting Senators to be elected by direct vote.

In the older States, especially in New England, there has been nothing so far to seriously challenge the wisdom or propriety of the present method of election, and it may be assumed that the New England Senators will continue to stand against any change. They would resent such a change, looking upon it as casting a reflection on the good will of their present constituency, and their resentment would be just.

In the New England States, where they still retain township organization and have very large legislative bodies, the result of the senatorial elections are almost always in accord with the popular wish, and Senators can almost be said to be elected by the popular will.

In the newer States, however, and especially in those of the West, the legislative bodies are much smaller in numbers, and, as experience proves, may be found subject to the manipulation and control of candidates who would never be seriously presented or supported by the people themselves. Not infrequently, serious charges have been made concerning the use of money to control members of the Legislature in the interest of senatorial candidates, and undoubtedly the use of money in such cases is becoming one of the crying evils of our political system. To-day three States have only half their senatorial representation in the United States Senate because of deadlocks in the Legislatures resulting in no election. In one well-known recent case the Governor of a State, in collusion with a minority of the Legislature, prevented the organization of one of its branches for the avowed purpose of defeating the senatorial candidate, who unquestionably had the support of a majority of the Legislature. None of these things could happen if a Senator were to be nominated in a State convention and run the gauntlet of a popular vote.

SENATOR JOHN M. THURSTON

The most serious objection to the present system as it has developed, is the fact that the legislatures in many of the States are now almost wholly selected in the interest of senatorial candidates, and with little regard to their general fitness.

It is impossible to set out in this article the many reasons which naturally suggest themselves in harmony with the broad suggestions above made. On the whole, my own judgment is that the best Constitutional amendment would be one permitting the several States to decide for themselves as to whether they would continue the election of Senators through their Legislatures or by direct vote of the people, and of such an amendment I have for many years been an earnest advocate.

EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS IN THE NEW CENTURY

NEW AND BETTER METHODS OF TEACHING

BY MATTHEW H. BUCKHAM,
PRESIDENT OF UNIVERSITY OF VERMONT

I WOULD name as the reforms in popular education most to be desired:

First. The handling of pupils in smaller groups and with more attention to individual needs. The multiplication of pupils without a corresponding increase in teaching force has resulted in massing children into large classes in which they are taught en bloc. The consequence is that the dull, who need special encouragement, become discouraged and drop out, and the bright, not kept fully occupied, lose interest and accomplish less than their best. The Academy at West Point gets splendid results by dividing classes into groups of ten according to ability. This system is, of course, costly, but the benefits of it would repay the cost wherever practicable.

Second. The coming age will insist on a stricter method in the selection of teachers, a method as effective as that which in business affairs compels the incapable man to fail and retire, and retains and rewards the competent.

Again, methods of teaching need to be better systematized. There are two kinds of teachers—those who teach mainly by inspiring, by awakening interest and enthusiasm, and those who teach by faithful, painstaking drill. And there may be said to be two philosophies, or methods of education—the inspirational method and the pedagogic method. Teachers of the first class are rare; if a great university has one or two of them, if a city or community has one of them, let them be thankful and make the most of their services.

Lastly, and most important reform of all, character-building will become the definite aim and object of all educational efforts. The school shall be a means of ennobling the industries, elevating the callings, purifying the citizenship, of all who come under its benign influence.

A HIGHER GRADE OF SCHOOL-TEACHERS

BY PRESIDENT JOHN HENRY BARROWS, D.D., OF OBERLIN COLLEGE

I DOUBT if the new century is to be as notable as the last along educational lines. The reforms which are needed in education have already been given a start. I expect to see what is, after all, the greatest need—a much better equipped class of teachers in our common schools. There is little possibility of improving the education of the people except through the improvement of teachers of all grades.

It is plain that the best minds are not too good for the work of teaching and training the young. Some of the most promising material in the nation is found in the country school houses. There ought to be a far more general requirement that teachers have special training in normal methods. The words "Better Teachers!" ought to be engraven on the hearts of all school directors. To accomplish this result there must be a more general spirit of liberality, rather, of wisdom, in making appropriate provision for the support of those who are to guide young souls in the most critical years of life. Give us teachers properly trained, with high ideals, and they will, under careful supervision, introduce the reforms most needed.

A system of instruction based on rational principles will discard some of the lumber which is now used. Many things are taught which are a waste of time and strength. But we shall not get good teachers, until successful teachers are continued in office during good behavior and efficiency.

LET THE CHILD FOLLOW HIS NATURAL BENT

BY DR. W. G. BALLANTINE

THE guiding principle of education in the twentieth century, will be genuine respect for nature's indications. The spontaneous activities of the child will be studied. For example, every boy at a certain age is in love with tools, and if he can get the use of them, spends his play-time in carpentry. This is the time when he should have tools in school and expert manual training. So each other subject should float into the boy's life on a wave of natural enthusiasm.

We shall make nature studies the staple work of the grades. Arithmetic will have a very subordinate place and grammar none at all. Gradually, but irresistibly, a rational spelling of the English language will follow other reforms.

CHURCH HOMES NEAR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

BY WEBSTER MERRIFIELD, PRESIDENT UNIVERSITY OF NORTH DAKOTA

BEFORE the close of the next century our religious denominations will have discovered the economy, religious as well as financial, of erecting church homes about our great public schools, thus availing themselves of the instruction and the scientific collections of the latter, while giving through these church homes such special moral and religious instruction to their youth as each denomination desires.

EDUCATION OF THE DEAF AND DUMB

BY PRESIDENT E. M. GALLAUDET, OF GALLAUDET COLLEGE

THE present condition of affairs in the education of deaf-mutes is peculiar, interesting and full of promise for the coming century. When the first permanent schools for the deaf were established in Germany and France, two methods were made use of. In Germany, it was contended that all deaf-mutes of good mental capacity could be taught to speak, and the oral method, to the exclusion of all others, has been employed up to the present time. In France, it was held that but a small proportion of the deaf were capable of acquiring a really successful command of speech, and that the greatest good for the greatest number could be secured by making considerable use of the language of signs and of finger-spelling, called the dumb language.

In 1880 an International Congress of instructors of the deaf was held at Milan, the result of which was that the French Government ordered the adoption of the oral method in the schools of France and the discontinuance of the manual method.

In the United States the first school for deaf-mutes, established in 1817, adopted the manual method as it had been developed in the French republic, and this method prevailed in our country for fifty years. In 1867 various causes led to the introduction of the teaching of speech into American schools for the deaf, and since that date a good many persons, instructors and others, have urged the adoption of the oral method of Germany to the exclusion of the French manual method. A spirited and earnest controversy in the schools has grown out of this, those formerly practicing the manual method, while willing to attempt the teaching of speech with all deaf children, being generally in favor of giving it up in the case of those whose ability to speak and to read the lips of others proved to be very limited. It has thus come about that a large majority of American schools for the deaf are to-day working under a combined system, in which all methods are made use of, their application being varied according to the capability and the adaptability of the pupil.

From all which it is not difficult to conclude that the deaf-mutes of the twentieth century ought not to be educated under the pure oral method, which the educated deaf of the nineteenth century condemn, but under the American Combined System, which they approve.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE UNITED STATES.

BY WILL CARLETON

WE are to have a United States language: in fact have it now in process of building. With English for a basis, we draw from the different vernaculars that come to this country, and add and interweave many of their most virile words and picturesque idioms: in ways more or less similar, all the best languages have been made. As new phenomena arise, new words have to be coined; and nowhere is this necessity more in evidence than in America. Our nation of seventy-five millions of people is constantly weaving a new language, which will probably surpass all those that have heretofore existed, and will go around the world again and again—and, in many places, stay.

Our pronunciation is constantly improving and becoming more uniform. It naturally varies with differences in climate, food, drink, race-influence, fashion, etc., etc.; but there are many agencies constantly at work tending to produce a uniformity; and this will naturally, in so ambitious a nation, finally strike the highest level. Among these agencies may be mentioned constant travel to and fro, long-distance telephones, phonographs, etc., which give people opportunities of hearing and imitating each other, such as they never had before.

SLANG DOOMED TO EXTINCTION

BY EDWARD PAYSON JACKSON

THE elite among writers and speakers, more than ever in the past, are cultivating simplicity, conciseness, and especially exactitude, in their diction. The young writer of to-day who yearns for admission to the best publications, and the orator who demands a hearing before the most cultured audiences, must be sparing of their superlatives. Given grammatical integrity and freedom from vulgarity, nothing will be more fatal to them than the use of words which overstate. And, as popular education advances, the more general will be the demand for a higher standard of linguistic strength and purity; for the more clearly will it be seen that overstatement is really dilution.

Slang, American or Anglican, is doomed to ultimate extinction. It is in language what the criminal class is among men, and criminals are notoriously short lived, the soonest forgotten.

THE PARAMOUNT HOPE OF THE NEGRO

BY BOOKER T. WASHINGTON

MY hope and belief is that the negro in this country will make himself so valuable in all the industries at his door that he will become an indispensable voter—that he will learn to do things so well that he will make common labor uncommon. My further hope is, that in every straightforward honorable way that he will seek to cement friendship between himself and the white people in his community, that he will appreciate more and more that the interests of the two races are of equal importance.

On the other hand, I pray that the white people in every part of this country will bear in mind that they cannot oppress or take opportunities from them—the negro, without the white race becoming degraded. Every race that oppresses another race injures itself and in the end must pay the price for its sin. In connection with thorough education, industrial development, and friendship between the races, there must go that high moral and religious conduct which will make a black skin respected.

THE CONTROL OF TRUSTS IN THE NEW CENTURY

THREE WAYS TO CONTROL COMBINATIONS

BY EDWARD ATKINSON

"WHAT Reforms should the New Century Bring in the Way of Controlling Great Combinations of Capital known as Trusts?"

EDWARD ATKINSON

1st. That in my judgment the only method of dealing with the so-called trusts is to require publicity of accounts, then trusting to the survival of the fittest. The combinations which survive will be those which do the greatest and most useful work at the very least cost to the community, paying of necessity the very highest rates of wages that the price of the product will permit to the workmen whom they employ.

2d. To remove all duties and taxes upon foreign products of like kind to those made by so-called trusts.

3d. To leave the trusts which are organized without the protection of letters-patent, for the purpose of creating a monopoly of any product of importance, to the natural law of competition, under which they will inevitably become bankrupt in a short time; a fate which has already struck a very large proportion of those which have been organized during the last seven or eight years.

HONESTY THE REMEDY FOR TRUST EVILS

BY WHEELER H. PECKHAM

IF the enterprise be one open to the law of competition, that law will be as effective in the coming century as in the one just ended. If the partnership, combination, joint stock company, or whatever it may be called, abuses its powers and charges for its product more than the ordinary average rate, more than the ordinary average rate of profits afforded by other industries, it will surely meet competitors who will compel a reduction of price. If any one thinks that it would be too powerful to be successfully attacked because of its great combination of capital, they must remember that the amount of other capital in other hands is also enormously great, and that there is no reason to apprehend that the proportion of capital or persons employed and occupied in any one enterprise to that and those occupied in others differs in any great degree now and in the past, or will present any appreciably greater defense to any of the laws of competition.

There is one class of industries in which the law of competition is futile. It is the class of monopolies. An illustration is a city railroad.

There can be but one railroad in a street. The man or corporation who gets the right to build that railroad need not fear competition. In such classes of industry, where the right to carry it on is given by the public, the remedy against imposition has always and will always consist in the right by the Government to fix fares, or, what is the same thing so far as the railroad company is concerned, to tax receipts. That remedy is perfect, and applies in all cases. Given honest and fairly capable public officials and no monopoly enterprise, so far as some public grant is essential to its use, could ever charge more than the price which would give a profit equivalent to the average of profits in other enterprises. It is a public scandal of the grossest character when the dividends of such a company are such as to make its stock in the market sell materially above par.

The remedy for these things in the present century will not be different from that in the past. Nothing new is needed except honesty—integrity in public officials. We will get it when in the other avocations of men the standard of integrity is made higher. That time is surely coming, though at present the signs are dim and a very long way off.

.. HOW ELECTRICITY WILL SERVE MAN IN THE NEW CENTURY ..

BY CARL HERRING

IT is often dangerous to prophesy, and I therefore had some hesitancy about replying to your request to send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few words about the probable future developments in the science of electricity; but as no time limit is fixed for the prophecies to be fulfilled, the risk may not be great.

Few people realize that to produce the light in the ordinary incandescent electric lamps, only a very small part of the energy in the electric current is actually used, at most one twentieth and probably much less, all the rest being wasted as heat. There is, therefore, the possibility of getting at least twenty and probably more times as much light from the electric current than is obtained at present in such lamps. When this is accomplished it will probably either be by electrical means or at least be discovered through the aid of electrical researches. Another problem which will revolutionize present methods, is to find some better way of converting the energy of coal and other fuels into electric currents without the aid of the very wasteful but at present indispensable steam engine and boiler, which give back to us on the average of about a tenth of the energy that we feed into it. The effect on our industries and comforts of getting from coal ten times as much of that convenient and useful power, electrical energy, as we do now, need not be detailed here. If both of these problems be solved, it would be possible to have at least twenty times ten, that is, two hundred times as much light from a pound of coal as at present. Besides the resulting luxury, comfort and economy of such cheap light, there would also be a wholesome effect on the diminution of crime, which so often requires darkness for its perpetration.

Great as the beneficial effects on our industries and comforts would be by these discoveries or inventions, they would not be as revolutionary as those produced by manufacturing the precious metals out of something else. The sea is known to contain a fabulously large amount of gold in solution, and the probabilities are that it will stay there, but if any method of extraction should be found that will cost less than the value of gold obtained, it would probably be an electrical one. Another possibility of the dim future is that we may be able to find out what the elements of electricity really are.

Power will be centralized more and more in large generating stations and be distributed electrically over long distances, to replace the hundreds of thousand small individual steam engines. Powers heretofore unused, such as water-falls, culm heaps at coal mines, gases from blast furnaces, etc., will be utilized and distributed electrically. Factories requiring large amounts of power will be moved to these central stations. New railroads will be operated electrically, and the existing steam roads will gradually, but very slowly, be converted, partially at least, into electrical roads; short trains or even individual cars, at frequent intervals will replace long steam trains at long intervals. Higher speeds will be possible and practicable. Mines from which it formerly did not pay to get the metal, will be worked by the aid of electric power or processes. The electrical furnace will be used more and more, either for making products which could not be made before, or for doing something cheaper than with gas furnaces. Electro-chemical methods will continue to replace the older chemical methods of producing many compounds and metals used in industries. Wireless telegraphy will come into more extended use, though probably only in such cases in which it is not practicable to make use of any kind of wire.

.. SHALL WE TRAVEL BENEATH THE SEA IN THE NEW CENTURY ..

BY REAR-ADMIRAL PHILIP HICHBORN, CHIEF CONSTRUCTOR

THE idea of successful submarine navigation is so attractive, and its possible applications in offensive and defensive naval operations are so great, that for many years most determined efforts have been made to produce vessels capable of meeting the chief requirements of such craft. There are at the present time several types of vessels said to be capable of successful navigation below the surface at moderate speeds. Of these, two are French vessels, of two distinct types, and the third is the well-known Holland submarine vessel, of which the navy now possesses one, manned by a naval crew, and is about to acquire several others, which are being constructed for it by the Holland Torpedo Boat Co. A fourth, an independent type of submarine vessels (Lake's bottom worker, the Argonaut), although not strictly a submarine vessel, in the sense that it is capable of floating in the water at variable depths below the surface, is still a vessel capable of moving beneath the surface by crawling upon the bottom. It was proposed and developed chiefly for commercial purposes, such as wrecking, diving, submarine construction, etc., and is said to have traveled considerable distances under water along the coasts of the United States.

The submarine boats of the Holland type are the fruit of a number of years of experiment carried out by the Holland Company at their own expense; and the vessel acquired from them recently has shown herself capable of maintaining a surface speed of ten knots and a submerged speed of seven knots, and has been entirely under the control of her personnel, both when moving on or beneath the surface. The control in both the horizontal and the vertical plane is very perfect. She has, furthermore, demonstrated her ability to avoid the vigilance both of search-lights and of picket boats, by running with her conning tower alternately just awash and completely submerged.

Of the future of vessels of this class, it is not possible to speak with entire certainty, because of the possibility, or even probability, of improvements in other lines, which will directly affect the submarine vessels. To be entirely successful, it is necessary that a submarine boat, adapted to naval purposes, should have a high surface speed, a reasonable submerged speed, perfect control, both in the vertical and horizontal plane, when on the surface or submerged, efficient ventilation of the interior, satisfactory accommodations for the personnel, and a considerable field of vision when submerged. What has already been accomplished in the submarine vessels at present in service, both in this country and abroad, demonstrates the entire practicability of obtaining all that is desired in many of these features.

We may reasonably hope that the developments which the past has seen in steam navigation and the advances in the armor and armament of vessels of war, may find their counterpart in the future developments and improvements of submarine vessels of all kinds

PROGRESS OF OUR CITIES IN THE NEW CENTURY

CITY DEVELOPMENT ON PRACTICAL LINES

BY JOHN DE WITT WARNER

IN attempting to anticipate what "reforms" we may expect in municipal matters during the next century, experience warns us that, while in some details they may be so radical and novel as to make that name appropriate, they will, in the main, be such that they would be more accurately termed "developments."

Taking up at random the matters with which city authorities are now busy: Artificial light has for centuries been recognized as a necessity of civilized man and public order. It is, therefore, rapidly and certainly coming to be regarded as a want which should be directly met by the municipality; and it is as nearly certain as may be, first, that public control, and, in general, public operation of city light plants will prevail. And we are tending rapidly toward a similar policy as to heat.

As to transport facilities: not merely will clean, dry and spacious streets be the rule, but systems of subway transport will probably be more extensive than are now surface ones; while, both above and under ground, the rate of transport will be such as to approach a free supply. That is, fares will be so low, as compared with other factors in the use of cars, that these self-same factors, and not expense, will determine their use by each. It is probable that, as in the case of water, the expense of individual supply, so free as not to limit use, will be fully met by fares so petty as to be scarcely more than required to prevent waste; and the operation by the city of these "moving highways" will become as much a matter of course as is now the repair and preservation of our streets for pedestrians. The whole field of express service will be so extended as to provide not merely messenger service much more complete than now, but for the safe carriage and prompt delivery to any part of the municipality of articles deposited at any other part. Telephone service, also, will be correspondingly cheap and abundant.

communication facilities will be the growth of public kitchens, where shall be prepared the meals of most of our citizens, which they will receive ready served, of better quality, and more promptly and regularly, than the domestic economy of the average household can hope to furnish them. These will have been preceded by public laundries, which will relieve the wage earner's household of a most important item of its present discomforts.

It is not easy to predict how shall be solved the problem of manual labor by married women. Whether with better wages and cheaper living they will be in general relieved of other cares than those of wife and mother? or whether, with more of opportunity for self-support and partially relieved from present home duties, the number of wage earners among married women will increase? It is practically certain, however, that the right of every child to good care, nurture and education will be better protected with every decade; that day nurseries will be one of the public facilities soon provided as a matter of course; and that labor which takes mothers from their children will be permitted only in cases where proper care of all children below school age is definitely provided for.

Public baths so nearly free as to be habitually used by all and so numerous and extensive as to leave such use unlimited, will be as much a matter of course as sufficient air for breathing. Still greater relief, not merely to the poor, but especially to those of moderate and large means, will result from such a complete system of hospitals that, by 2000, for one who is so ill that he cannot go about, to remain at his residence will be as unusual as a hundred years since it was universal. In every considerable city, education, to the fullest extent of the capacity of its youth, will be literally free as air, and up to what would now be considered a high standard, make quite compulsory in one way or another.

More provision will be made for public recreation. Beautiful sculpture, instructive paintings and fully equipped libraries will characterize the typical city.

And long before the year 2000 taxation will have been so adjusted as to encourage, not discourage, the fullest improvement of land; public franchises will be so universally operated direct by the public, that a street railway company or private water-works for public supply will seem as archaic as personal government by royal charter, or the farming of taxes.

AN IMPROVED TENEMENT HOUSE SYSTEM

BY RANDOLPH GUGGENHEIMER, PRESIDENT OF THE NEW YORK CITY COUNCIL

MOST obvious of all the conditions which need reform in the city of New York, is the tenement house system. This crying evil has challenged the attention of the Legislature of this State and thousands of public-spirited citizens. Nothing else could result from such a state of affairs. The floors of these apartments, from the cellar to the top, are rented to any number of families from four to a dozen. For the children who are born and reared under such circumstances, there is only one exit and one playground, the stairs and the hallway. The evils that flow from unsanitary condition of such tenements are not to be deplored as much as the perverted morals which are the necessary consequence of the indiscriminate associations of boys and girls in crowded passage-ways. The Legislature has been half-hearted in this matter. Individual effort, however earnest, stands baffled and aghast. Those philanthropists who have invested their capital for the establishment of improved dwellings for the working-classes where sanitation and light, which is the best police power in the world, shall be first considered, have conferred an inestimable benefit upon this community. They have been able to find a satisfactory return for the investment of their capital, but their desire has been absolutely unselfish.

I am personally convinced that we cannot expect a remedy for the ills of the tenement house system from the Legislature. The revolution must be brought about by individual citizens. The aggregations of wealth in the hands of individuals have become so large that I venture to think that the step which has already been taken will be followed by increased attention to the regeneration of the tenement house districts. The ownership of wealth, on a last analysis, constitutes a trust; and I believe that those owners do not discharge their public responsibilities who fail to perform the duties towards the poor, the suffering and distressed which, at least within the reach of conscience, devolve upon them. No better charity—in fact I was about to say there is no other worthy charity—can be performed than by the erection of improved dwelling houses for the people. Such a requirement as this is demanded for the sake of public hygiene. Unsanitary conditions in the tenements mean the contamination of the public health. Pathological experts have found there the hotbed and breeding place of tuberculosis.

The ideal public official, therefore, must realize that cities must, in every department, be run on a scientific sanitary plan. It is not sufficient that we possess an admirable system of sewers; the whole body politic must be safeguarded from disease. The lamp of science has shown that disease clings to infinitesimal globules of dust, and has pointed out death in the incomplete consumption of offal and garbage. I have been, for many years, convinced that every street in the city of New York should be flushed twice a day with salt water and that the refuse of the city should be burnt. Fire is the only purifier; and the germs of disease should not be entrusted either to the water or to the air, however true it may be that, in the former case oxygenation destroys all impurities, all foreign matter.

The time will come, in the history of civilized communities, when the two most important departments of a city's government will be recognized as those of Health and Education. I believe that the health of the community can be materially improved by a regular flushing of the surface of the streets by salt water, by the consumption of all refuse by fire, and by personal cleanliness, to be secured by the working-classes in public baths, the number of which should be largely increased.

WILL KINGS DISAPPEAR BEFORE the CENTURY ENDS?

BY COL. ETHAN ALLEN

"WILL kings disappear?" Of course they will, as they are the product of darker ages, and surely must become unnecessary in the dawn of the twentieth century. The world progresses in all its relations, both inanimate and animate. The age of ice is followed by the age of bloom; the saurian passes away and more useful life succeeds him; and man, who began as a "cave-dweller," now walks the floors of a palatial home, which is adorned becomingly for this "Lord of all," whose mental equipment at last weighs and estimates the stars. Shall development stride onward to greater results everywhere and halt at politics? Politically, man has fought his way from the lowest round of the ladder of social control to the highest, and to-day, that highest is republican rule, or the reign of law as commanded by the people. This means that kings must pass away, following other defunct forms of government.

The steps of the marching millions of the earth up to Washington, are politically well defined. Beginning with the "Paternal head" of his tribe, whose sway was when the world was young, we advanced to the "Patriarch," whose word was law to many peoples. Following the changing experiments of Egypt and of Greece we reach the absolutism of Imperial Rome. The Cæsars, broken by their own tyranny, the "Feudal Lord" as their successor was the legalized pirate of the Middle Ages. Then came Monarchy, at first absolute, but afterwards softened by constitutional provisions as man began to assert his power against the insolence of kings. Then followed the last and grandest achievement for political progress, the American Revolution and the inauguration of the great Republic, which, by its example, is to-day teaching the nations of the earth that kings are but impostors who have outlived their day. The unrest which now surges under the thrones of Europe like volcanic fires within the planet, comes from the idea which this Republic inspires, that crowns and coronets should go to the museum, with the thumb-screw and other implements of suffering which were once the safeguard of the thrones of the entire world. The irrepressible conflict for the overthrow of monarchy begun in the last century, shall surely acquire increased strength in the century to come. Evolution never goes back but forward; and the Republic, which stands for man as his own property and not as the chattel of a special class, expanding and conquering, means a higher civilization, and better conditions of life. France is a republic; England trembles upon the verge of a change; Germany is held fast to ancient and barbaric rule by a hand of iron; but her bayonets are of the class which has the power to think, most dangerous to rulers when the hour of opportunity sounds its ominous knell.

Christianity has given the world its highest civilization. Wherever the Cross has been raised, there has man lifted his eyes to a realization of higher and nobler life. It has been forced to advance step by step with tyrannical rule, but at its highest tide it has usually favored and taught the greatest leniency in government. It has steadily moved forward till all the Western Hemisphere bows before the Nazarene symbol, and long before this Europe acknowledged it. Aggressive, persistent and always armed, because of its faith in the righteousness of its battle, it is now reaching its ever conquering arms towards Africa and Asia. In China, it has been hurled back, but he reads with but little wisdom who fails to see that this is but the recession of the wave, to gather its strength into one mighty billow for a higher reach upon the shore.

As Christ came to teach of the life hereafter, so Washington came, in a lesser mission, to teach of a better way of life on earth, with liberty of thought and action to do what seemed best between man and his Maker, without the restraint, the tyranny, the cost and the impertinent opulence of kings. And so the Star of Bethlehem is supplemented with the Star of Mount Vernon, the free life assured by the second being necessary to the free religion of the first, and this twin constellation, of evil omen to kingly rule, in the destiny of man must make the circuit of the globe and take effect in every country

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

To Connect Two Continents

BEW comes from the Turkish capital that an engineering project many years old is at last to be realized. This is the building of a bridge over the Bosphorus, the narrow channel which at Constantinople separates Europe from Asia. The Bosphorus connects the Sea of Marmora with the Black Sea, a distance of sixteen miles. In some parts of its course it is two miles wide, but in others it is only six hundred yards, or about one-third of a mile in width. At one of these narrow places near Constantinople, the bridge is to be built. Granite foundations will be laid at three points in the bed of the channel, and on these, massive towers will be erected for the support of the steel cables from which the floor of the bridge will depend. In deference to Turkish taste, the summit of each tower will be ornamented with a cupola and four graceful minarets. The chief difficulty in the construction will be in laying the granite foundation for the towers, as in the narrow parts of the channel the current is swift and strong. The depth is about three hundred feet. It is interesting to recall the fact that, twenty-four hundred years ago, a bridge was constructed near the same place. It was built by the Greek, Mandrocles, for the passage of Darius and his army, and was defended by the Greeks, until Darius, having completed his campaign against the Scythians, returned and re-crossed the bridge into Asia. The Sultan does not propose to have the new bridge put to any such use. He has arranged to have artillery mounted on the towers, with which he could prevent an enemy crossing. The object of the bridge is to connect the railway systems of Europe with the Trans-Asiatic railway of Bagdad. It is curious to notice how civilization is gradually adapting the natural conditions to its purposes. At Suez, where two continents were united, it severed them by cutting a water channel; in this instance, where two continents were separated by a channel, it connects them by making a roadway. In both cases the change facilitates travel, and so is an obvious improvement. Some men have thought that it was possible to make improvements in the means by which men may pass from earth to heaven, but all such schemes have proved failures. God reserves to himself the conditions of that journey.

The heaven, even the heavens are the Lord's; but the earth hath he given to the children of men (Ps. 115: 16).

A Juvenile Murderer

There was an impressive scene in a New York court on Dec. 14. The grave, dignified judge on the bench had before him a prisoner in knickerbockers, a boy only fourteen years old, scarcely tall enough to look over the railing. He was there to be sentenced for the murder of a playmate. He had quarrelled with the boy and cherished a grudge against him. After a few days he procured a shoemaker's knife, and while playing with the boy he deliberately cut his throat. He was quite unconcerned as he stood to receive his sentence, which was twenty years at hard labor. So indifferent was he, that when the warden turned his head away, the prisoner slipped a piece of candy into his mouth and stood chewing it while the judge addressed him. The judge, on the other hand, was overcome by emotion. The thought of the lad's crime, his disgrace, his parents' sorrow, and the terrible punishment it was his duty to inflict, so broke him down that his voice faltered in passing sentence, and he wept. It was some moments before he recovered sufficiently to finish his sentence. The youthful culprit was led away munching his candy without a sign of care. He will find out during his long imprisonment the reason the judge wept in sentencing him. The judge knew better than he what he would have to endure. It is so with impenitent men. God assures them that he pities them even while he punishes.

As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live (Ezek. 33: 11).

A Daughter's Claim

Suit has been brought in a court in New York by the daughter of a recently deceased citizen against the executors of her father's estate. She claims nine hundred dollars for services rendered to her for her filial services. Happily, the position of the Christian is the reverse of this. His hope consists in his being regarded as a son and not as a servant.

Thou art no more a servant but a son, and if a son then an heir of God (Gal. 4: 6).

A Conditional Inheritance

A peculiar condition is made in the will of a recently deceased millionaire, as to the inheritance of his estate. The clause in the will was made public a few days ago, in the course of proceedings in a law court in San Francisco, Cal. It appears that a Colorado miner, who had accumulated a fortune of three million dollars, settled some years back in San Francisco. He was childless and had no near relatives. In the next house to the one he occupied, there was a little girl to whom he became much attached. She was a beautiful child, with rich golden hair. The millionaire was never so happy as when the child would come into his house and cheer him by her infantile prattle. He

At the hour appointed, his store was filled with interested spectators and a still larger crowd blocked the street outside. A civil justice officiated at the ceremony. The furniture-dealer had provided a huge wedding-cake, and announced that every lady present might have a piece of it at the conclusion of the proceedings. A curious coincidence occurred among the spectators. Two of them were engaged to be married. They were at Hoboken on that day by mistake. They had set out for Newark to eat their Thanksgiving dinner with some friends in that city, but had taken the wrong car, and were landed at Hoboken just as the ceremony in the window of the furniture store was beginning. The young man suggested to his companion that they should follow the example thus publicly set. They had been playmates as children in Germany and had long been pledged to one another. They had no thought of being married on that day, but when they saw the other wedding take place they soon made up their minds. The services of the justice were secured and the two were speedily made man and wife. So the furniture dealer accomplished more by his peculiar advertisement than he expected. It is much to be wished that people who are postponing union with Christ were similarly affected when they see others entering into fellowship with him.

Ye became followers of us and of the Lord . . . so that ye were ensamples to all (I. Thess. 1: 6, 7).

BRIEF NOTES

Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress has now been translated into two hundred and three languages.

The money spent in Ireland in intoxicating drink last year was $60,000,000. This is an average of about twelve dollars a head.

Under a recent act, every mechanic of Belgian birth and resident in Belgium, who attains the age of sixty-five years and is in needy circumstances, will receive an annuity of thirteen dollars.

The oldest Jewish rabbi in regular service in the world, is said to be Rev. D. W. Marks, who has ministered to the synagogue in West London for sixty years. He is in his ninety-first year.

Dr. Joseph Parker, of London, has been following the example of Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon, in editing a secular daily journal for one week. In one of the issues he boldly denounced the Prince of Wales and Lord Rosebery for the interest they take in horse-races.

The prospects of revision of the Presbyterian creed are not bright. The statistics show that the demand for revision comes from the ministers rather than the laity. This indicates that the changes which may be made in accordance with the recent vote of the Presbyteries have small prospect of receiving the requisite two-thirds vote of the church.

The French people cannot be congratulated on the latest test of their liberality and philanthropy. The total number of persons entering the Exposition was upwards of forty-eight millions. The boxes for the reception of gifts for the poor were opened when the Exposition closed and were found to contain fifty-eight francs and sixty centimes ($11.72). The Exposition did not pay expenses by $400,000.

A remarkable discovery has been made in the Libyan Desert. Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt, who found the collection of the "Sayings of Christ" recently, have now found a papyrus containing a hymn which must have been written earlier than 300 A.D. It is in Greek, and its words have so many allusions to the Gospels that there is little doubt it was one of the hymns sung by the very earliest Christians in the catacombs. A translation of the hymn is now being made by eminent scholars.

The General Committee of the World's Student Christian Federation, at their meeting held in Versailles, France, in August, 1900, appointed Sunday, February 10th, 1901, as the Universal Day of Prayer for Students. The Committee which has appointed this day includes official representatives of the Christian student movements of Germany, Scandinavia, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United States, Canada, Australasia, South Africa, as well as Japan, India, Ceylon, China, and other mission lands, including 1,400 student societies, with a membership of 65,000 students and professors. During the past three years, this day has been observed in over thirty different countries by students and by people interested in the work of Christ among students.

father during the last six years of his life. Twenty-four years ago she received an offer of marriage, but her father being a widower, who would be left in a lonely condition if she left home, induced her to reject the offer and stay with him. He promised to reward her generously, and told her that certain investments he was then making in the West should be made in her name. She ascertained that they were so made, and remained at home waiting on her father and cheering his declining years, until he died a few months ago. During that period many opportunities of leaving home occurred, but she did not avail herself of them. When her father's estate was examined, it was found that the Western investments not proving satisfactory, he had withdrawn his money, but had omitted to make an equivalent provision for his daughter in his will. She therefore put in a claim for servant's wages, and as the statute of limitations barred a claim for the earlier years, she asked for payment for the six years allowed by the statute. Her brothers, however, who are the heirs, decline to pay it, holding that she was in no sense a servant, but had all the privileges of a daughter during the whole period of her residence with her father. It would seem that even taking that view, her claim might have been admitted, inasmuch as she had sacrificed her own interests to her father's comfort. It must be very humiliating to her to have to take the position of a servant to obtain compensation offered to adopt her, but her mother could not bear to part from her. However he saw a great deal of her, and when his will was opened after his death, it was found that he had made her the heiress of his wealth. Provision was made for her maintenance and education during her minority, and on her coming of age she is to receive the entire estate, providing "she has led a proper and virtuous life." She is now five years of age and is a bright, intelligent child. She has a very substantial reason for behaving herself, for if she misbehaves she will lose the fortune bequeathed to her. That would be a great pity, because such misbehavior might cost her not only the loss of her fortune, but if not repented of, might involve her exclusion from an infinitely better inheritance, which is only for those who are pure in heart.

Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven: blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God (Matt. 5: 3, 8).

Marriage as an Advertisement

A furniture dealer at Hoboken, N. J. has adopted a novel method of advertising his business. Among his acquaintances were two persons who were engaged to be married. He offered them a set of bedroom furniture as a gift if they would have the wedding ceremony performed in his show-window on Thanksgiving Day. They consented, and he made the approaching celebration known in the city.

TOLD AROUND THE HEARTH

THE RUMMAGE SALE

: : : AT CLARK'S

"I'm going to the rummage sale, Edward."

"Don't you want my escort? Am I not to go, too?" asked the husband, smothering a sigh. The fire was bright, the library table was heaped with books, and the easy chair very comfortable to a tired man. Mr. Harvey never ceased to wonder that his wife liked to go somewhere in the evenings, forgetting that her duties kept her at home most of the day, while he was downtown.

As for the rummage sales, which were just now so popular, he had his own opinion. But as his wife and his sisters often accused him of being a wet blanket, he thought he had concealed it. He was mistaken.

"I don't need you in the least, dear," said Mrs. Harvey, "I am going with Mrs. Tilden, our neighbor, and, to tell the truth, you would be rather in the way. And besides, you know you don't approve of our performances, and you would simply stand glooming about, like a policeman out of uniform. We get fun for ourselves, as well as shekels for our charity, in these rummage sales, besides ridding our houses of any amount of ancient finery and disreputable odds and ends, which are picked up with delight by the buyers at Clark's. They are mostly young working girls and their mothers, and it is really an immense saving to them to be able to annex to their wardrobes our cast-off wraps and frocks. Mr. Ellerslie is to do the selling for us this evening, so you see the minister is on our side."

Mr. Harvey looked grave. "You women have no sense of the finer morals, no conscience," he grumbled. "And Ellerslie is being spoiled among you. He might be in better business. I wish, instead of these ridiculous makeshifts for building your new day nursery you'd just bravely go about with a subscription paper, and ask for the money you want. As it is, you are robbing Peter to pay Paul."

"Goodness, Edward! Don't be so glum," pleaded his wife, brushing his forehead with her soft lips as she passed him. At the door she turned, a beautiful vision in a dark, wine-colored gown, and a heavy fur-trimmed wrap. Her husband looked up admiringly.

"Don't mind my scolding, Nelly. Run away and perform your good works in the style you like best. There'll not be a prettier woman in the crowd."

It was a wonderful jumble, that rummage sale. Old hats that might have been worn by Mrs. Noah, old cloaks and gowns, children's jackets, last year's shirt-waists, every variety of toggery under the sun, heaped the narrow counters which had been hastily laid on barrel supports, covered with gay silks, and arranged along the walls of Clark's Hall. In the middle of an East Side square, where houses once aristocratic had by degrees degenerated, until they were thronged with unsavory tenants, Clark's Hall was a social centre, leased by a benevolent guild, and open every evening in the year. To-night it was transformed by bright streamers of gay-colored muslin, until it resembled a holiday bazaar, and as tea and lemonade at two cents a cup were served at one end of the room, the similarity to a church fair was quite marked.

Other articles besides clothing were offered for sale, a miscellaneous assortment of cracked pitchers, old platters, coal scuttles, egg-beaters, rugs, fans, screens, rocking-chairs, picture frames, the sort of flotsam and jetsam which is stranded by time on top shelves and in the corners of store-rooms. They were, to do the ladies justice, disposed of at nominal prices only, many of them for a few cents, few at anything beyond a dollar or two, and the avidity with which the eager-faced, pallid and toilworn purchasers clutched their bargains was pathetic. The crowd thinned as the counters became less plethoric. People rushed away with their possessions as proudly as if the old things they had chosen were of real value. The truth is that deep down in the souls of men and women slumbers a great love for spending money, however difficult its earning may be.

Mrs. Harvey and her friend Miss Clitheroe were sitting in a dark corner, discussing the plans for the projected day nursery. Miss Clitheroe was the Guild's president, and her eyes were weak, so that she avoided the gas jets. But her will was of iron firmness, and she wholly disor was aghast, but what did he, a bachelor, know about women's wraps?

The lady borrowed something to go home in, and rushing to Edward, poured out with tears the story of her evening and her loss.

"It may be recovered from a pawnbroker's," he replied, musingly.

"As if ever I would wear it again," said Mrs. Harvey with much indignation. "This finishes me with rummage sales."

But the next morning, as they sat at breakfast, Mr. Harvey's door bell rang, and a rough-looking man in laborer's clothing entered with a parcel.

"My daughter bought this garment at a rummage sale last night for four dollars," he said. "The card in the pocket showed me that it belonged to you, ma'am, and that there was a mistake. I have brought it back, and will be glad of the four dollars Maggie paid. We are honest people. The child did not realize what she was doing."

Mrs. Harvey could have fallen on his neck and wept. She gave him the four dollars. He refused to accept any more. But that very day she looked Maggie Moran up in her home, and bought her a thick jacket, in which she did not look nor feel frozen that winter.

An Arab Morning Meal

Under all skies people must breakfast, but the conditions of the morning meal agreed with Mrs. Harvey on one or two important points. They were talking very earnestly when the young pastor of St. Luke's approached them with a wrap on his arm. It was large and very warm-looking.

"Do you think four dollars enough for this cloak, ladies? It is in very good condition, and the young woman who wants to buy it is fearfully poor and very thin and cold—half frozen, she seems."

"Four dollars is a very good price," answered Mrs. Harvey, without a glance. "Do let the poor woman have it," and she turned back to Miss Clitheroe, resuming the thread of her argument.

Fifteen minutes later, when Mrs. Harvey was ready to take leave, there was a vain search for her costly, new fur-trimmed wrap, a wrap which had been sold to her for sixty-five dollars a few days ago. The wrap was not to be found, but on auditing the cash account, it was evident that it had passed, for the sum of four dollars, into the hands of a wearer who probably needed something warm and thick quite as much as did Mrs. Harvey. The pas-vary in different climes and countries. Given his thick, black coffee, and his bit of bread, an Arab chief can breakfast to his own satisfaction, and though in the desert the Arab guide may provide European food for the traveler, he seldom varies his own simple menu. The Syrian woman waits till her Lord has eaten before she herself partakes of any refreshment.

All over the Oriental world man is the sovereign, and woman, even when loved and honored, as she no doubt sometimes is, still accepts submissively and without a protest, the second place. Veiled and unobtrusive, she is a servant to the stranger, and thus remains, and must remain, until the Christian religion shall emancipate her.

Wasteful Worry

Our Lord tells us in nothing, to be anxious, but in everything, to make known our requests unto God. There are crises in every experience when not to worry seems impossible. With no money in the house, no flour in the barrel, no coal in the cellar and no work for the husband, a woman can hardly be expected to sit with a smiling face. And yet, man's extremity is God's opportunity. There is good sense in the words of the Psalmist, "Oh, tarry thou the Lord's leisure!" Worry does not fill the pocket-book, the barrel, nor the bin, nor find the man a business position. God can do all the needful things, if only the Christian can trust and obey.

It may not be my way,
It may not be thy way,
But yet in his own way
The Lord will provide.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR

TO the young in their gladness,
The old and the grave,
To the sailor far out
On the blue-rounding wave;
To the child, to the maiden,
The near, and the dear,
I send forth this greeting,
A Happy New Year.

A year to be busy
From morning till night,
In breaking down evil,
In building up right,
A year full of struggle,
A year full of cheer,
God give all his children
A Happy New Year.

Other People's Business

Among the minor sins, if there are any, must be included a disposition to be meddlesome. The fussy and intrusive person who meddles is probably perfectly honest and truthful. He would not take your money or malign your character, but he interferes with your comfort, is officious in giving advice, and makes comments where he is not privileged to be critical or called upon to speak at all. The homely proverb about minding one's own business is rather rude, but there is a great deal of good sense wrapped up in its short and pithy sentence.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—PERPLEXED. Say, "Why, yes; you are very good." If you don't want the escort, say, "No; I thank you."

—O. S. N. A man does not take a lady's arm in the street, nor does she take his, unless she is very old and infirm, crippled or blind.

—INDIA. Flora Annie Steel has written several stories about India, and you will find much entertaining literature of a trustworthy kind in missionary biographies.

—TIMID TRAVELER. Leave your fears at home when you take a journey. You are not the conductor nor the engineer, and have no responsibility. Trust in God, and be confident in the discretion of the average man.

—L. S. It would be unusual and not in good taste for a young lady to visit a young gentleman at his home, either before or after betrothal. He should do the visiting. Christianity is not involved, but good form is, in this question.

—JEAN C. Set the deep dish on the platter as a cup stands on a saucer. Do not think at all about the impression you make when meeting new acquaintances. Be natural and feel kindly towards all. With a little observation you will make no mistakes.

—COUNTRY GIRL. In reply to a letter from a friend asking permission to escort you anywhere, you need only write thus: "My dear Mr. —. I will be happy to go with you on such a date;" or, "I regret very much that I cannot accept your kind invitation for such a date." Sign yourself "Sincerely yours."

—ELIZABETH. It is no longer considered necessary to say "Yes, Mrs. Jones"; "No, Mr. Brown." Yes and no are usually sufficient. To an elderly lady or an old gentleman, if you are specially courteous, you will say "Yes, madame," and "Yes, sir," but you do not use these titles to people of your own age.

—SADIE W. It is not wrong to read good novels. Those you mention are very good literature. About palmistry I cannot answer. It is very entertaining. A good palmist is, I think, a mind-reader. Hands reveal character certainly and so do faces. These are, however, merely amusements and do not merit serious consideration. Designing is taught at such schools as Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, Drexel, Philadelphia, and Armour, Chicago.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

THE ORIGIN OF USURY*

EVERYWHERE in the pages of the Talmud the highest honor is paid to manual labor. "He who teaches his child no trade brings him up to be a thief," said Rabbi Judah, the Holy. "He who earns his living by labor is greater than he who fears God," are the words of another rabbi. Many of the religious teachers were men earning their living at some trade. Rabbi Shammai was a mason, Rabbi Hillel a wood-cutter, Rabbi Tshah a blacksmith, Rabbi Joseph Ben Chalahga a currier, Rabbi Nehemiah a potter, Rabbi Orchaiah a shoemaker, Rabbi Pinchath a stone-cutter. The Apostle Paul was a tent-maker, and boasted: "These hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me." Spinoza, the great Jewish philosopher, would take no compensation for his writings, but maintained himself by his trade—crystal polishing.

In regard to usury, the Bible denounced its practice with great severity, and the Talmud re-echoes its denunciations: "If thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee, then thou shalt relieve him; yea, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner, that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase, but fear thy God, that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase." Lev. 25: 35, 36, 37. Even a garment taken as a pledge could not be retained over night. See Ex. 22: 26.

The Talmud strictly forbade any form of usury. One must not borrow a measure of wheat to return the same after harvest, as during that time the wheat might have gained in price, and thus the debtor pay usury. Not only did it forbid the practice of usury, but it compelled those who had unlawfully demanded it to return the same. The practice of usury at that period was principally a Roman custom. While the Jews were farmers, shepherds and artisans, the Romans were mainly soldiers, traders, writers and philosophers. While the rabbis were mechanics, the two latter classes among the Romans were bankers and usurers. Cato, Brutus, Seneca and Cicero, are examples in this line.

In all the large cities of the Roman Empire there was a nucleus of wealthy Jews—a company of merchants carrying on business upon a rude scale; a large number of artisans and hundreds of poor and needy ones barely eking out a scanty living. The same condition prevails to-day in all the large cities of England and on the Continent, and we have a striking example in our own New York, with its two hundred thousand Jews of the lower class.

CRACKER COURTSHIP†

THE courtship of the Georgia cracker is not long. A week sometimes is the extent of it, a summer season the usual time; and rarely do a young man's addresses continue longer than a year. The girls are like girls in other circles, some of them too easily pleased; but if, perchance, a young man finds one who exacts much, he makes no effort to meet her demands, but comforts himself with the thought of the large number who make no demands. Perhaps by the next Sunday he is married, while the young woman may never marry.

My friend at Waleska had described the ordinary cracker courtship and marriage to me. I remember one or two cases he mentioned. He was talking to a young man about his prospects in life. The young man had been in school a short time, and my friend was hopeful of him. "Well, I's quit school; can't come no longer. I'spects ter git married 'n bout er week an' settle down ter housekeepin'." My friend asked whom he was to marry. "Donno yit; goin' ter see ter-day; want ter 'gague you ter tie us up, though; 'spect it 'll be nex' Sunday." "What?" said my friend, "marry next Sunday, and do not know whom you are to marry? My friend, there are many things to be considered before marriage."

"How do you know? You ain't married. 'Spects I's got 'bout's much right ter marry as you has ter keep single. Ef I finds er gal ter day I'll write you, an' you be prepared ter marry us within er week."

The next day the following characteristic note reached my friend:

"Found er gal; be ready fur us nex' Sunday."

All day Sunday my friend expected the couple to come, but they failed to appear. Just at dusk one of the schoolboys told him that the young man was in the road a short distance from his house, and wished to see him. He sent the cracker word to come to him, but the boy refused, and my friend went to see what he wanted. Barefooted, and in his usual crackerish dress, he stood in the middle of the road, anxiously waiting.

"Is this here the way you keep yer 'gagements? Pity the gal you marries ef you don't come ter time no better'n you does ter marry other folks. Won't 'gague you no more."

"Where is the young woman?" was asked.

"She's over ther in the bushes. Wouldn't do fur us ter stand here together, 'caze folks passin' 'long might 'spect what's the matter an' stop ter see the job well did. It kin be well 'nough did without nobody lookin'." I don't want nobody, an' Becky don't neither. Come along, Becky."

The young girl, with slat bonnet, blue calico dress, and bare feet, emerged from the bushes. The minister tried to persuade them to go to his house, but they stubbornly refused. He told them witnesses were necessary, and with some difficulty succeeded in persuading them to allow him to go for two of the schoolboys. They were married, and both bride and groom thanked him for his services. The boy said:

"I know'd Becky 'd thank you. She thanked me when I axed her. I know'd I warn't going ter have no trouble. She was the fust gal I axed, an' she had me. But, say, thankin' ain't 'nough fur you. I owes you er bushel o' taters fur tuition now. Whin I pays you, I'll put in er gallon more fur the marriage. Becky, does you think you's worth er gallon o' taters an' er dollar and er half fur license, too?"

He looked doubtful, and they walked off man and wife.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER

God's Glory amid the Starry Host

ASTRONOMICAL WONDERS REVEALED BY THE OLD CENTURY TO BE ECLIPSED IN THE NEW ~ ~ ~

BY DOROTHEA KLUMPKE, D. S., UNIVERSITY OF PARIS AND OFFICIAL ASTRONOMER, PARIS OBSERVATORY....

AT no period has astronomy advanced with such giant strides as in the course of the nineteenth century. The assistance brought by improved instruments and photography, physics and chemistry, have transformed it from a mere study of the zenithal distances of the stars and their motion, to the analysis of their spectra, which tells their composition and their stage of evolution from the nebulous gatherings which form the genesis of a world, to the barren plains which mark the world that is dead. A revolution has thus been brought about in astronomy, far-reaching in its effects, which will pave the way for other discoveries doubtless greater than any heretofore conceived. In astronomy there can never be a backward step; not a moment is lost, not an effort wasted. It is the pursuit of infinity, infinite in its possibilities, finite only in its promise of truth.

Observing 50,000 Stars The eighteenth century was closed by the observations of 50,000 stars made at the observatory of the Ecole Militaire, by Jerome de La Lande, and his nephew, Le Francois de La Lande. On these observations, all subsequent studies and comparisons have been based. In the first quarter of this century, Walston saw the solar spectrum, and black lines crossing the colors, but he did not understand them. Following in his footsteps, Fraunhofer gained further knowledge concerning the spectrum and interpreted it, naming the colors for the first eight letters of the alphabet. He found that the same lines which are black in the sun are brilliant white in the vapors of terrestrial substances, such as water, iron, hydrogen, magnesium, or carbon. If two spectra, one of the sun of our universe, or of any star that forms the centre of another universe, and the other of a vapor found on earth, are laid side by side so that a given black line corresponds with a given white one, all the other lines, white and black, are found to correspond exactly. This proves that they all follow the same law. For over fifty years, photography has been used in astronomy with startling and ever-new results. Great as is the improvement of the large and perfected modern telescopes over the mural quarter circles of the last century, equally great is the improvement of photography over drawing, in clearness and accuracy. The sensitive plate finds much that the eye could never detect, for it is capable of a protracted exposure, whereas the eye at a telescope becomes dimmed after a minute or two. It has revealed double and triple stars, formerly unsuspected; it has watched the movements of variable stars, and has yielded precise information concerning the nebulae.

Searching the Heavens

To the naked eye, stars are perceptible only to the sixth magnitude; at one time, not more than five or six thousand can be seen, although the impression is conveyed that they are legion. After the sixth magnitude, the aid of a telescope is required, and hence the importance of a good instrument. To-day, the stars visible from the first to the thirteenth magnitude aggregate to about 43,000,000, of which nearly 10,000,000 have been photographed. In the most powerful telescopes, even the fifteenth magnitude has been revealed; of this magnitude, perhaps 100,000,000 stars are suspected; but knowledge concerning them is uncertain. In the Milky Way alone there are some 10,000 stars, separated by vast distances. To the eye at the telescope the sky seems no longer dotted with constellations, but powdered with gold dust.

Great Discoveries Predicted

The discoveries of the next few years depend upon the further improvements that can be made in lenses and photography. It is unquestionable that the twentieth century holds revelations in store for astronomers; but to hazard the barest theory as to what they will be, is impossible. Nature jealously keeps her secrets, even from her most devoted children. It is in the unguarded moments that she is surprised, and a new light is thrown upon the world. But as the purest artistic inspiration is futile without knowledge and strength, so science depends upon the perfection of the mechanical methods which lead to her attainment. Each improvement innovated broadens the limits; each limit broadened opens out the way to infinity.

[Miss Dorothea Klumpke, the author of the foregoing article, is an American girl, and is one of the astronomers of the French Government, carrying on her studies regularly at the Paris Observatory. Whenever an event of importance to the astronomical world has taken place of late, this talented astronomer has been assigned to observe it. Seven years ago she won a degree of Doctor of Sciences at the Sorbonne. She had studied astronomy long before it became her intention to devote herself seriously to the science. Her thesis was, "A Study of the Rings of Saturn," and it has come to be regarded as a standard. She became assistant astronomer at the observatory of Paris soon after leaving the Sorbonne. She passed her verbal examination successfully and was the first woman to obtain the degree of Doctor of Science and Mathematics. All the members of the faculty voted in her favor.]

An Aged Saint's Translation

A memorial notice in a local paper, Philadelphia, N. Y., begins: "Entered into the rest of Paradise at her home, Nov. 24, 1900, at the close of day, Mrs. Fidelia Danforth, in the ninety-third year of her age." Seventy-one years ago, this venerable servant of God, then in her twenties, came with her husband, Henry Danforth, to the Quaker settlement, now Philadelphia. They were among the pioneers of the town, and their sterling character made itself felt on every side. Mrs. Danforth's memory was rich with stories of historic interest. The last battle of the war of 1812 had made a startling impression on her mind (although she was very young at the time), because in that battle she had lost a brother. As an active member of the Congregational Church in her village, a sympathizer and helper in all good works, she exerted an influence which for years to come will be bearing the fruits of righteousness. Her daughter, Mrs. Babcock, writes:

It seems to me only a fitting tribute that my mother's entrance into life eternal should be mentioned in the paper she loved so well. She has taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for nearly twenty years. She looked forward to its coming each week, and although she could not of late years see to read herself, I read it to her every Sunday. Her mind was clear and bright to the last. She was perhaps the oldest subscriber on your list.

ENGLISH ARMY CHAPLAINS

The Bishop Beloved by all Soldiers,
Only Clergyman Who Won the V. C.

AFTER the many articles that have been printed in these pages about chaplains in the American army, and their work in the Philippines, in the West Indies, and elsewhere, our readers will find the following sketch of two notable chaplains in the British army very interesting. The leader or head of all the chaplains in the English army is Dr. Edghill, who occupies the unique position of the Bishop of Army Chaplains. For thirty-seven years, promoted as Chaplain, and later as Chaplain-General, he has lived among soldiers. It was not until 1864, after his health had failed in a Whitechapel curacy, that Dr. Edghill began, at Aldershot, his work in the army. His work here was very successful, and was the first indication of his wonderful influence with the men. In the year 1866 he was sent to Halifax, Nova Scotia. So great were the love and admiration felt for him throughout the army that on the death of the late bishop, in 1895, he was unanimously elected as his successor.

The selection of chaplains lies entirely in Dr. Edghill's hands, and on him alone has rested the responsibility of whom to send to the war. There are at present twenty-four chaplains serving in South Africa. Their duties are to attend to the sick and wounded and to the dying, and to hold services for the living.

Dr. Edghill insists strongly on obedience, and regards it as "the great secret of usefulness." He is also a great advocate of temperance.

Another notable clergyman in the British army is the Rev. James William Adams, who accompanied the forces in the Afghan War. To him belongs the distinction of being the only clergyman to whom a Victoria Cross has been awarded. In all the hardships of the campaign "Parson Adams," as the soldiers called him, took his full share. On at least two occasions he gave up his horse to a wounded man. It was, however, at Killa Khazzi that he performed the deed which won him his Cross. Chaplain Adams had dismounted in order to better assist a badly-wounded man, when his horse, alarmed by the heavy firing, bolted. Nothing daunted, the brave clergyman pursued his way on foot towards the front, where desperate fighting was in progress. On his way thither he came upon a deep hole, at the bottom of which, in the water, were two wounded troopers entangled with their horses. A glance sufficed to show him that the men would never succeed in disengaging themselves without assistance; so, although the fierce Ghazis were close at hand, and certain death awaited every living thing that came within striking distance of their razor-edged swords, he dashed down the slope, jumped into the water, and, by dint of much pulling and hauling, got them both safely to land.

THE CENTURY'S RECORD

WE gaze upon the cycle past
So rapid in its flight,
And note along its shining way
The increase of the light.
We see the rapid progress,
The wonder-working power,
Transforming and uplifting,
Enlightening hour by hour.
We read upon its record fair
Of great and noble deeds,
That human hearts have learned to care
Each for the other's needs;
The holy ties of brotherhood
Each darkened land illumine.
The Century plant, though slow of growth,
Is bursting into bloom.
The light of God has sent its rays
To pagan land afar,
And longing eyes have turned their gaze
To Bethlehem's Morning Star.
O wondrous light, shine on! shine on!
A beacon and a guide,
Until the Holy Bridegroom comes To claim his glorious Bride.

The Pao-Ting-Fu Martyrs

A STATEMENT of how the Christian compounds in Pao-Ting-Fu were destroyed and their inmates massacred, has just been given out by the American officer whose duty it was to investigate and report upon the matter. It is believed that the missionaries in the north suburb at the Presbyterian compound—Mr. and Mrs. Simcox and their three children, Dr. and Mrs. C. V. Hodge and Dr. George Y. Taylor, had no appreciation of peril until they heard the tumult of an approaching mob, howling for the lives of Christians. Outer buildings were rapidly demolished; the missionaries and their Chinese students and servants, about twenty in number, retired to the chapel, and barricaded it, while Dr. Taylor, at an upper window, asked the mob what they wanted. "The lives of all Christians!" they answered. "Why?" he asked, "what have we ever done to harm you? Have we not helped the sick, the poor and the needy? Have we not gone among you, lived as you lived, suffered and died with you? Why will you kill us?"

Arguments and pleading were futile; the mob tried to force the chapel. With what arms they had the refugees defended themselves nobly, and drove the Boxers out of the court, wounding ten and killing the leader, Chu-tu-tsi, who the day before had been invested with the gilt button by a government official, as reward for cruelty to Christians. The Boxers were repulsed in a second attack, and set fire to the buildings. The chapel was soon destroyed, all of its gallant little company perishing by fire, save two children, Paul and Francis Simcox, who, in their terror and agony, opened a door and rushed out, only to be seized and beheaded. The Chinese Christians and servants, true to their teachers and masters, died with them.

Next morning, July 1, the Pithin compound, in the south suburb, where lived the representatives of the American Board, Mr. Pithin, Miss Merrill, and Miss Gould, was the object of attack. From a building in the rear, to which the missionaries and their Chinese converts and servants had retired, Mr. Pithin defended those under his protection until his ammunition was exhausted. As the crowd, battering down the door of his refuge, rushed in, he fell, brave to the last, fighting at the door of the young ladies' room. The two girls were dragged out. Miss Gould, unable to walk from fright, was tied, hand and foot, slung over a pole like a pig, and so carried along; while Miss Merrill, led by the hair, her hands tied behind her back, headed a procession to the Boxer temple, but not before seven native Christians and servants had been killed in the compound. A number of imperial soldiers were serene spectators of all these proceedings. Crowds lining the streets spat upon the young ladies and clutched and tore at their garments. Here they were quickly joined by Mr. and Mrs. Bagnall, their child, and Mr. Cooper from the English compound, which had likewise been despoiled. After a mock trial, all were roped together, with the exception of the little girl (five or six years old), who ran along clinging to her mother's dress, and marched through the city amid jeering, taunting crowds, out at the south gate, along the wall to the southeast corner, and there beheaded, one by one, again with the exception of the little girl, who was impaled on a Boxer's spear.

HOW HE FOUND CHRIST

A Boyish Comrade's Words Led Doremus A. Hayes to the Master

DOREMUS A. HAYES, who now occupies the chair of English Bible in the Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill., was between eleven and twelve years of age when he received his first serious impression of religious obligation. It was one Sunday morning at the close of the Sunday School service, on the broad stone steps before the old Raper Chapel in Dayton, O., that his best boy friend laid his hand upon his shoulder, and said:

PROF. D. A. HAYES

"Doremus, I am going to join the Church this morning, and begin the Christian life; and I want you to go with me."

This sudden appeal took Doremus by surprise. His friend had never spoken to him before on the subject. He was totally unprepared for such a proposition. It came upon him like a shock, and he promptly said:

"No. You must go alone. I am not ready."

The two boys had been great chums, and had gone everywhere together. Thus far they had shared experiences. Did this mean that they would be separated in some way? From the moment of the appeal, through the entire church service, and up to the time when invitation was extended to such as might wish to unite with the Church upon probation, Doremus was in agony. He had told his friend that he must go alone; he saw him respond, and somehow felt that he himself would be the lonely one. Yet, as the struggle went on within him, he became more and more clear in his conviction that his first decision had been a proper one. This was not the way for him to begin the Christian life. He needed time to think it over.

Doremus Hayes had a general impression at this period of his life, that all good people belonged to a Church, and that this should be his own case. He also had the impression that only Christians had a right to Church membership; and he set himself to find out what Christians were. For six months he studied that problem in his boy fashion. He went to Sunday School and to church services always with that in mind. He listened and asked questions. He watched the lives of good people. He found out that the secret of a Christian life was in Christ; and at the same time realized that he himself had no conscious relation to Christ.

Six months and more went by. The winter revival meetings were being held in the church. Doremus went once or twice. He was not much impressed by them. Then he was present in a meeting which seemed to have no special power in it, and in the after service he was standing with the rest while the invitation was being given for penitents to kneel at the altar. Just then his Sunday School teacher came to him and gave him a personal invitation, which, to his own surprise, he accepted. He found himself kneeling at the altar, and there for the first time he realized that this meant serious business.

A half hour passed, and an hour; the meeting dragged. There was no indication of special interest or power in it. But he was oblivious to everybody and everything; at last he woke to the consciousness that the people were singing:

Pass me not, O gentle Saviour!
Do not pass me by!

The seeking boy made the words of the song a personal prayer. Then a strange thing happened. He did not have any vision. He did not see Christ; but he knew he was there. He did not hear Christ's voice; but he knew his pardon was spoken and that he was adopted into the family of the saved. He did not feel Christ's touch; but he knew the Master had laid hand of benediction on his head. There at the Saviour's feet the boy burst into a flood of tears—tears of gratitude and joy.

Professor Hayes from boyhood has ever been of an undemonstrative temperament. When he feels most deeply he is most quiet. It was so that night. He had nothing to say. He could not have framed a testimony; but he had had an experience. He went home but said nothing to his parents. If any one had asked them for the next three days whether he was converted, they probably would have had no sure ground for answer. He went quietly about his school work and his daily home duties. During those three days he lived there, as he expresses it, "Fathoms deep in an ocean of peace." For three days Christ's hand of benediction was upon his head, and he walked softly with him. On the third day he was standing on the stone walk by the side of the old Fifth District School in Dayton, in the playground, when that hand seemed withdrawn. It seemed to Doremus that he came up, up, up, out of that ocean of peace into the world he had known before, and he felt that he was accepted and saved, and must live the saved life there in the school and in the ordinary daily duties.

Summing it all up, Dr. Hayes says: "I have never envied Paul his experience on the road to Damascus. My experience was as real and as satisfactory as his. He was blind for three days, until the scales fell from his eyes. I was speechless for three days, awe-stricken by the glory of the Presence revealed to my heart, knowing I could not adequately express the blessedness my soul felt, anxious neither to say nor to do anything to disturb this infinite peace. At the end of three days my tongue was loosed, to speak about these things. Since then I have been able with the full assurance of Paul to tell others that the Christ has been revealed in me and the life I now live I live by faith in him."

Wilhelmina's Betrothal

Wedding Garments Wrought by Orphan Fingers—The Queen Wins Her Lover to the Temperance Cause

EVER since the announcement of the Queen's engagement, Holland has been in a state of joyful excitement. It seems only yesterday that papers the world over were full of pictures of the pretty, merry child, with her donkey or her dolls; next, with the girl, a crown on her brow, a royal mantle trailing from her shoulders; next, as was fitting, this Queen whom everybody loved, appeared as hostess of the World's Peace Congress.

Last fall Wilhelmina came back from her summer in the Tyrol, hanging on the arm of a stalwart Prussian chasseur, and saying, with smiles on her lips and flowers in her hands: "I have had the happiest summer of all my life!" The grave counsellors knew what that meant. There was a betrothal at the palace, Loo; then a journey to the Hague, where she presented to her people her future husband, the Prussian chasseur, who is also Duke Henrik of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, sixth son of the late Grand Duke Frederick Francis II. As the royal carriage drove from the station the good Dutch folk shouted welcome and sung the "Wilhelmus" (their national air) until they were hoarse. Later, there was a reception at the palace, when the Queen introduced her young Duke to the Diplomatic Corps with the grace and dignity befitting the occasion. Then came the grand court dinner, when the queen-mother, forgetting, as queen-mothers must, what her child's marriage means for her, spoke of what it means for Holland. Meanwhile, telegraph wires buzzed with good wishes from kings, queens and other great personages, among them the Czar, at whose asking she had entertained the Peace Congress; the Kaiser, who has always shown affectionate interest in the girl-queen, and the President of the great American Republic.

Now Holland is a-flutter over preparation for the wedding. Burly burghers talk about wedding gowns, and grave counsellors of state are interested in bridal veils and other frippery. The trousseau will be almost wholly of Dutch manufacture. The embroideries on the white satin bridal dress, tulips and orange-blossoms, will be the work of a number of orphans in whom the Queen has shown kindly interest. Lingerie is being made under the auspices of societies for aiding distressed gentlewomen and at orphanages and schools. The Queen is fond of fine needlework, and is taking a lively and girlish interest in her trousseau.

But Holland has more to talk about than wedding clothes. These are the lovers themselves, who are riding and driving about like ordinary sweethearts, without imposing escorts; and the Dutch like the Teutonic simplicity of such proceedings. The honeymoon is to be at the House in the Woods.

The Queen's public definition of her

DUKE HENRY OF MECKLENBURG-SCHWERIN
Betrothed to Queen of Holland position on the temperance question is one of the most interesting occurrences in connection with her betrothal. In responding to the congratulations of the Woman's League, a great temperance organization in the Netherlands, the queen reiterates her determination to remain a total abstainer, and promises to give her most energetic and active support to the cause of temperance in Holland. Neither she nor Queen Emma touch alcoholic beverages; and ladies and gentlemen of the Dutch Court have found that a good road to royal favor is to follow royal example and turn their wineglasses down at public dinners. Duke Henrik has been won to the Queen's way of thinking, to a total abstinence and support of the temperance cause—all of which create a sensation in Potsdam and Berlin, where the corps of young officers to which he belongs are known to take some pride in being considered champion drinkers.

YOUTHFUL CONSECRATION

... An Experienced Philosopher's Recipe for Making the Best of Life

VERY few young people in a Christian country deliberately make up their minds to give themselves to the world and sinful life. Their intention generally is to repent of evil at some future time, and to give their attention to religion at some period before they die. The matter is simply postponed. Other matters, such as getting an education, finding a suitable partner in life, entering on business and the acquisition of a fortune, are of immediate concern, and religion can wait for a convenient season. Such a decision is frequently unconscious,—more a matter of action than deliberate intention, just as we postpone to another day something that may be done at any time. The writer of this mysterious book of Ecclesiastes, whether it was Solomon or some later philosopher, gives advice to such young persons. He had been a close observer of human life, a man of remarkable experience, who, setting out on a search for the "chief good in life, with abundant means for conducting his search, sought it in wealth, in pleasure, in learning, and in statesmanship, at last found it in faith and peace with God. He would save young people from the sorrow and disappointment that he bore in his long and weary search, and he therefore tells them where the chief good of life is to be found and recommends them to secure it early in life.

The argument throughout is profoundly philosophical. He explains why, with every advantage in his favor, he failed to secure what he sought in any of the courses which were, and still are, supposed to yield satisfaction. Few, if any, of us have so many facilities as he had. Learned, rich, influential, one would have thought he must have succeeded, if any one could. He did succeed in securing the prizes of life, but he found that they did not yield the satisfaction that he expected from them. They did not give rest or happiness. There was no resemblance in his life to the fabled fox, who, failing to reach the grapes, consoled himself with the declaration that they were sour. He tasted the grapes and proved that they were sour. "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity," is his conclusion after every victory. But here at last he finds the blessing for which he had been searching so long. True happiness is to be found in adjusting life to the Creator's plan. Unflinching trust in God, a sincere desire to do his will, a longing after holiness, a kindly, benevolent, cheerful disposition, a readiness to help the unhappy and the unfortunate—these are the means by which he attained happiness. It is worth while to listen to this man, who has tried many ways and eventually found the right one. As a man about to visit a distant land about which he knows nothing can meet no one more useful to him than one who knows that country thoroughly; as a man seeking gold can have no better help than the miner who knows where it can and where it cannot be found, so this ancient philosopher is the friend of all young people.

"Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth," is his advice. And it is sound. The memory of a father and mother at home, has kept many a young man in a distant city out of dissipation; but the consciousness of God's all-seeing eye is a more potent bulwark against temptation. You may enjoy life, you may have pleasure, but do not forget God—that is his injunction. Remember his wisdom, his love, his protecting care—that will keep you in peace, calm in the midst of trouble and storm. It is said that old men who had been under the care of Dr. Arnold, at Rugby, when they were boys, felt his influence to the end of their days. When they were tempted to prevaricate, to do anything mean, the thought of that high-spirited gentleman rebuked them and braced their courage to do the right. How much more does the thought of the living God keep a man from evil! And the advantage cannot be had too early. It is at the beginning of life, that the good or the mischief is done. Habits are formed then that persist and influence all the future. It is so much easier for one to do right, who has been trained to do right in his youth, than for one who attempts to change the current of his life in his manhood. And, after all, what better can we do with our lives than to make them what the Creator intended them to be? Therefore, the wisest course, the best for ourselves, and the best for the world around us, is to place ourselves in his hands, to make of us the best that can be made. To remember him, in the sense of considering his wishes in regard to us, that is the way to happiness and usefulness—in a word, to making the best of life.

Flag Day June 14

Editor The Christian Herald:—Will you kindly state with reference to an article which appeared in your issue of December 12 (page 1039):

The flags which were forwarded to the school children of Manila, Hawaii and Porto Rico were sent by the "District of Columbia Society, Sons of the American Revolution." These flags were purchased and forwarded to members of the District of Columbia Society, S. A. R., in Manila and Porto Rico, and to the secretary of the Hawaiian Society, S. A. R., in Honolulu. Lieut. Col. Russell B. Harrison is a member of the District of Columbia Society, S. A. R., and is not secretary of the Porto Rico Society. The National Society, Sons of the American Revolution, and the Sons of the Revolution had nothing to do with sending the flags.

It is hoped that in future the celebration of 1901 may surpass any previous celebrations, and that every reader will either wear or display from his residence the Stars and Stripes, noblest and best flag in the world, standing for a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." May we all stand by the Stars and Stripes.

HENRY WHITEFIELD SAMSON,
Secretary of the Flag Committee, District of Columbia Society, Sons of the American Revolution.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions Will be Answered Feb. 6

1. Is a country under good laws and a bad ruler better or worse off than a country under a good ruler and bad laws?
2. In the event of a child being kidnapped and held for ransom, is a parent right in yielding to the demands of the kidnappers, or should he put his duty to society before personal feelings, by refusing to endorse the crime, and making every effort to bring the kidnappers to justice?
3. What should be the course of a Christian wife toward an irreligious and scoffing husband whom she greatly desires to bring to Christ?
4. Can a man be a Christian and be prominent in the formation of trusts and also speculate in Wall Street?
5. When furnishing a "reference" to some employer concerning some person he wishes to engage, am I morally bound to disclose facts derogatory to the person under consideration, or am I justified in keeping silence and simply answering the questions asked?

Questions of the Week

1. Should a Church sue a pewholder for non-payment of pew-rent?

When a family or person hire apartments in a house they are under obligation—moral and legal—to pay rent. So, when a person or family hire a church pew, they simply hire an apartment in God's house, and are under the same obligation. That pew is legally their property for the time being, to the exclusion of all others, and they certainly should pay for their privilege. If they cannot pay, the pew or some other one should be given to them without payment. If they will not pay their rent, it is wise for the church authorities to try every other legitimate method before suing the guilty parties, and if those methods fail, then sue them, as a landlord would for his rent. R. T. EDWARDS.

Regarded simply as a corporation, which is proverbially supposed to have no soul, a Church undoubtedly possesses the right to sue one of its pewholders for non-payment of pew-rent. But, regarded as the divine agency on earth in the regeneration and saving of the souls of mankind, it may well be questioned whether the exercise of the right of coercion can add to the conquests of peace and good will, or the extension of church influences in reference to their higher and truer objects, which are not financial, but contrarily, charitable, in the manifestation of love and sympathy with those who are in distress. The moment a Church ceases to be a voluntary organization, based upon the needs of mankind, and becomes a machine to be run on purely business principles, regardless of circumstances, involving difficulties in making the two ends meet at the homes of its members, that moment it fails in its chief mission of alleviating their sorrows and supplying those consolations which are denied them by the cold charity of the world. R. I. MIDDLETON.

A Church cannot afford to resort to law. Being a spiritual organization, it would be false to the teachings of Christ and the apostles if it went into the courts on such a matter, or indeed on any matter. There is a distinct provision in the Gospels for cases of the class to which the non-paying pewholder belongs; but, before everything else, it should be definately learned whether he is really able to pay. Should he be in financial straits, the Church should assist rather than oppress him. If he can pay but will not, he should be seen and reasoned with by the older members (see I. Cor. 6: 5, 6, 7). In any event, legal action is out of the question. In the last resort, if the pewholder, being able but unwilling to pay, holds his church relationship so contemptuously that he will listen to no advice, he should be denied church privileges (see Matt. 18: 16, 17). E. J. HARDY.

2. In what instance were instructions given for the performance of a miracle without there being any record of the result?

The miracle of the tribute money (Matt. 17: 24-27). Peter was instructed to cast a hook into the sea and was assured that a piece of money, doubtless a shekel, would be found in the mouth of the first fish he caught. This would be sufficient to pay the Temple tribute for Christ and Peter. (See Exodus 30: 13). Peter would, doubtless, obey, but the evangelist does not record the fact. Some have supposed that no miracle was intended, but read the passage thus: "Take up the first fish that cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth [that is, killed him] thou shalt obtain a piece of money," that is by selling the fish. There are many objections to this interpretation, and among others the improbability of Peter catching a fish which he could sell for a shekel. The style in which the incident is mentioned seems to imply a miracle, but the peculiarity is that we are not informed what the result was—a matter in which the evangelists are generally careful. ROBERT WYNN.

Correct answer received also from John S. Goldsworthy.

3. Is it right for a parent to show more love for one child than for another?

A wise parent will be careful not to show such preference or partiality for one child as another, and a parent may come to rely upon him, but that is no excuse for showing more love. The true parental love will show no preference either by act, or word, or voice, or smile. RAY SESSIONS.

4. Are early marriages to be commended or condemned?

Commended, most certainly, because (1) marriage is a sacred relation, instituted by God, commended by Christ at Cana, and pronounced by the Holy Ghost "honorable in all." 2. Those marrying early are likely to be so well acquainted with each other as to understand each other's disposition and temperament, becoming easily assimilated. Hence, if spared, they are more likely to remain loving and affectionate down to old age. 3. The experience of all time has been decidedly in favor of early marriages. 4. Paul says to Timothy (I. Tim. 5: 14): "I will that the younger women marry." JOHN H. SHERRARD.

While we may not condemn early marriages indiscriminately, it is quite certain that they are to be deplored in very many instances. In these days the struggle for existence is by no means an easy one. How is it to be made easier for two young, immature and inexperienced people, who join themselves in wedlock in a happy, romantic spasm? He may be a steady, intelligent workman, and she a careful wife; but they must be an exceptional pair indeed if, after a few years of married life and with young children at the table, they do not find the struggle a hard one. Both then realize that, though they may love each other dearly, a few years more of preparation and accumulation before marriage would have been an immense advantage. Usually, their lives become a dreary and monotonous drudgery, with the young wife fading early and the husband becoming a mere wage-earning machine. This describes the average result of

ANOTHER ISSUE OF OUR BEAUTIFUL TWO-CENTURY CALENDARS

With our usual liberality toward the members of the large CHRISTIAN HERALD family, these superb Celebration calendars will be placed within the reach of all who desire them at TEN CENTS FOR EACH COPY, which, of course, includes postage. may excite the jealousy of the rest. Yet it is perhaps impossible to love all the children equally. There are intellectual and spiritual affinities that naturally draw a parent's heart toward one child more than the others. There are even opposite qualities which excite special admiration and love. And perhaps there is nothing that appeals to a parent's tenderness so much as weakness of body or mind on the part of some one of the children. The very helplessness of a child moves our pity, and "pity is akin to love." These and other causes seem to make it impossible to distribute our love equally over all the children in the family. And this partiality or preference, within due bounds, seems to me to be right. It is a fundamental law of our being to have special loves. Now we cannot obey that law outside of the family, and wholly ignore it within the family.

Yet a parent ought to be careful not to show any marked preference for one child over another. It may be inevitable that he shall have such an innate preference, but in his dealings with his children he ought to be as fair and impartial as it is possible to be. Laxity here has wrought ruin in many families. In the parable of the Prodigal Son, there is reason to suspect that the younger son was pampered before he made that unfortunate break. We fear, too, that David was too partial to Absalom, and suffered in consequence. It was Jacob's marked partiality to Joseph that excited the jealousy of the other sons. Let him that readeth understand. JOSEPH HAMILTON.

It certainly is not right. Such treatment is in opposition to all Christian teaching. The home becomes thrown out of harmony by such a course. The child less kindly treated soon grows discontented, dissatisfied, and jealous; a feeling of "don't-care" becomes noticeable. One child may be brighter than early marriages among the workers. In thousands of cases they do not result even so well. With the well-to-do, of course, the different conditions may have a different outcome, but even here very early marriages are frequently most unfortunate. One point in conclusion—early marriages are fatal to ambition, and put a sudden end to thousands of promising careers. The old saying: "Whoso hath a wife and children hath given hostage to fortune to prevent great undertakings," is as true to-day as when it was written, centuries ago. On the whole, therefore, it would seem to be the wiser way for a young man to have his profession fixed, his income fairly assured, and the dazzling illusions of immaturity well over before he takes a life-partner. He will then act wisely and well if he unites heart and fortune with one who has all the qualities that combine to make that most excellent of beings, a good wife. ALEXANDER LAMBERT.

5. Apart from Luke's statement that Christ went to Nazareth with Joseph and Mary and was subject to them, is there any passage which indicates how he spent the years previous to his baptism?

The Gospel narrative is very brief on this point. 1. Of Christ's childhood, we read: He "grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom; and the grace of God was upon him," Luke 2: 40. 2. Of his youth, besides the account of his remaining behind in the temple (Luke 2: 41-50), he was subject to his parents, and "increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man," Luke 2: 51, 52. 3. From Mark 6: 3, "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary?" We may infer, as Edersheim says, "with great probability, though not with absolute certainty," that Jesus followed this trade until the time came for him to go forth upon his ministry. The Gospels are meant to teach us of a Saviour, not to furnish a full biography of Jesus of Nazareth. G. E. KRAUTH.

Miscellaneous Questions

Chas. S. P., Dalhousie, Prov. Que. What does intemperance cost the United States per annum on the average?

The nation's drink bill for the last ten years has averaged over $1,000,000,000 a year.

G. W., New York City. What course should one take with a person who continues to force his favors upon him who cares not to receive them?

The simplest course would be to decline all such favors, return all gifts, and politely request that such attention be discontinued. This course, however may not be open to everyone. A person who is dependent cannot say: "I wish you to do so much, no more for me." He must endeavor tactfully yet frankly to make it clear to the other that the acceptance of such favors places him under obligations he does not wish to assume. A sensitive nature shrinks from such obligations. Care should be taken however not to wound the feelings of the giver, whose motives may be of the best, and who deserves the kindest appreciation.

A Subscriber, Colorado Springs, Col. Please state the average number of men who die through the effect of intemperance in one year in the United States; also in Great Britain.

There are no absolutely accurate statistics. Mr. Wheeler, in his Prohibition: the Principle, the Policy, and the Party, estimates the number of deaths in the United States due directly to the use of alcoholic liquors as 30,000 in the year 1889, while in the same year 120,000 "hard drinkers" died from all causes. Dr. Norman Kerr, in his Mortality of Intemperance, reckoned the number of deaths in the United Kingdom (Great Britain and Ireland) due directly to the use of alcoholic liquor as 40,000. Adding the number of deaths indirectly caused by drink (neglect of children, exposure, etc.), and the estimates run as high as 120,000 deaths per year in this country.

Inquirer, Milbury, Mass. Many years ago when a school-girl I learned to trace the stars. I found Altair in the double constellation Aquila et Antinous, a star of first magnitude, the centre of three bright stars in a line bearing northwest and southeast just two degrees apart. I notice the southernmost star has moved further away and out of line. Can any one explain the matter?

Perhaps some reader who is a student of astronomy may be able to supply this information.

F. J. T., Roanoke, Va. If a young man asks a lady acquaintance to go with him to church, and she says she cannot go with him, and goes alone, what should be his attitude toward her afterward?

We do not think the lady is bound to give her reasons for declining. They may be very good ones, or otherwise; but in any event, she should have the unchallenged right to choose her company. The attitude of the other party should be that of polite acquiescence, without subsequent reference to the incident.

Ohio Reader. Give a brief history of the Society of Rosicrucians.

A pretended fraternity in Germany, which existed simply in a book published in 1614, telling how Christian Rosenkreuz, a German noble, born in 1388, visited the holy sepulchre and spent three years in Damascus, engaged in the study of physic. He built a sort of convent, in which he, with seven friends, established the Rosicrucian Order. The members traveled everywhere to promote the reformation of the world, meeting at the central house once a year. They claimed the possession of the highest knowledge, and freedom from sickness or pain, though not from death. The title of Rosicrucians was finally adopted by a society of alchemists at the Hague, in 1622, and afterwards by the fraternities.

E. H. B., Tremont, N. J. We have no confidence in such concerns.

Jennie, Spencerport, N. Y. Send us your address and we will forward the information by mail.

Subscriber, New Haven, Ct. Yes. Send full address, and information about Bibles will be forwarded.

Reader, Spangle, Wash. We have already repeatedly expressed our views on dancing and similar amusements.

Mrs. J. P. F., Montpelier, Vt. 1. Atmospheric pressure or density. 2. The cause and history of the Chinese war has been fully explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. J. A. S., Waterloo, Ia. 1. All nationalities inhabit the slum districts, Americans included. 2. Evangelization had greatly improved woman's condition in China until the recent troubles stopped progress by closing the schools and colleges.

THE PIONEER AMERICAN EXPERIMENT OF ITS KIND, IT PROMISES IMPORTANT RESULTS

By PROF. W. W. WHITE, D.D.

WHILE at Yale, as far back as 1887, I began to realize how prevalent is the ignorance of the Bible even among theological students and ministers, and to appreciate the importance of the study of the English Bible. While Professor of Hebrew in Xenia Theological Seminary (1890-1894) I introduced more of the study of the English version into my courses than ever had been there before. The students, I felt, ought not to be asked to acquire, through a dead and poorly learned language, anything that they could secure from the English version. After getting what they could from the English, I took them to the Hebrew. They appreciated this. During four years of my Theological Seminary professorship, I did much Bible teaching at conventions, synods, conferences, and in various communities, and learned more than ever about the great and general need of a simple knowledge of the contents of the Book.

Though enjoying my work in the Seminary, I felt cramped, and became convinced that I ought to give myself more exclusively to English Bible work. Mr. Moody offered me a position in the Chicago Bible Institute, which I accepted. There I remained for two years, after which time, in 1898, with the approval of Mr. Moody and Mr. Torrey, the superintendent, I went on leave for two years, at the call of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. to work among college men in India. During my sojourn there I attended fourteen representative conventions of students and missionaries in all parts of India and Ceylon. One of the strongest impressions which I received during that experience was the need (confessed by scores of missionaries representing all denominations) of a more thorough and comprehensive and constructive knowledge of the Bible on the part of those going to the foreign field. On leaving those shores, I determined that, if God would permit, I would do something not only for one mission land but for all, in the way of providing the best possible Biblical instruction for those under appointment to the foreign field, who might wish to have it.

We have chosen Montclair, N. J., a suburb, rather than New York itself, as the home of our Bible Teachers' College, because the purpose is to make this college, in a sense, a quiet retreat as well as a school. Having missionaries who are at home on furlough prominently in mind, we believe that a quiet home-life is more desirable than a city location. The directors of the Montclair Young Men's Christian Association have granted us the use of their new auditorium for our class-room work at a nominal sum, and we have been offered the use of more church buildings and chapels than we need. We put practically all our income into men rather than into buildings. We feel that enough money is now locked up in religious buildings, and that we would not be justified in seeking, at any rate at present, to secure buildings. We do not the centres of Bible study in the English-speaking world."

The Mission Board secretaries approve our work. From several of them, I have already received lists of missionaries at home on furlough, with most cordial commendation. We expect besides the Seminary department, to have a Correspondence department, a Literature department and an Extension department. Students will do original work under the personal direction of professors. The professors will not merely lecture the students. We propose to educate; to teach. The America, but India, Burma and China also. The session opens in January rather than in September or October, in order that the principal may have the summer and autumn for general work both at home and abroad. It must not be forgotten that this is an international movement, and besides, this plan fits in well with the work of both missionaries at home on furlough, and with theological students. The missionaries generally desire a number of weeks for rest and speaking in the churches, and theological students may come to the college for a month or two, after finishing their regular year in the seminaries.

So far as it is possible to have him do so, we propose that the student shall let the Bible be its own interpreter. We propose to reverse the usual order, and have men go to the Bible itself before they go to helps, to make up their own minds independently of the opinions of others.

All truly evangelistic effort has its basis in an intelligent knowledge and use of the Word of God. When the Bible is properly explained, it is a power. The average evangelist would need to shout less and exhort a shorter length of time if he put more of real Biblical teaching into his address. I believe the message through Jeremiah is literally true. "Is not my word as a fire, saith the Lord, and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?"

We propose to teach our students how to teach. We shall organize community classes, within easy reach, and also provide teachers for those Sunday Schools that may wish them, teaching our own courses. Nearly every Sunday School in the country would be a gainer, if it had at least one class not following the uniform lessons. Next, we shall go outside and organize classes among non-churchgoers. There are tens of thousands of intelligent workmen and women in and about New York City who will respond to the right kind of Biblical instruction.

In our training, we propose to give large attention to soul culture. We do not mean to undervalue intellectual effort. We feel, however, that a man will do his best intellectual work when his soul culture is properly provided for. We mean, in the study of these two key subjects, prayer and the Holy Spirit, to do quite as thorough work in the way of examination of the Scriptures for their teaching as is done in any of the other departments, and we trust that these may in an especial manner be made helpful to the devotional side of the student's life.

Y. M. C. A. BUILDING, MONTCLAIR, THE BIBLE COLLEGE HEADQUARTERS—PROF. W. W. WHITE, D.D.

expect even to erect a dormitory for our students. We feel that it will be better for them to be paying guests in homes in Montclair. Dormitory life at best is not ideal. The clergymen of Montclair are without exception in hearty sympathy with us. The Episcopal rector was the first man to be enrolled as a student in the school. One woman, the wife of a Young Men's Christian Association's secretary, was ahead of him. Rev. Amory H. Bradford, of the Congregational Church, in a letter expressed himself as follows: "The plans are practical, scholarly and comprehensive. If they are carried out they will make Montclair one of

THE · CLOUDLESS · MORNING

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D.

TEXT: II. Sam. 23: 4:
"A morning without clouds"

WHAT do you expect of this new century?" is the question often asked of me, and many others have been plied with the same inquiry. In the realm of invention I expect something as startling as the telegraph and the telephone and the X-ray. In the realm of poetry I expect as great poets as Longfellow and Tennyson. In the realm of medicine I expect the cure of cancer and consumption. In the realm of religion I expect more than one Pentecost like that of 1857, when five hundred thousand souls professed to have been converted. I expect that universal peace will reign, and that before the arrival of the two thousandth year, gunpowder will be out of use except for blasting rocks, or pyrotechnic entertainment. I expect that before this new century has expired the millennium will be fully inaugurated. The twentieth century will be as much an improvement on the nineteenth century as the nineteenth century was an improvement on the eighteenth. But the conventional length of sermonic discourse will allow us only time for one hopeful consideration, and that will be

The Redemption of the Cities

Pulpit and printing-press for the most part in our day are busy in discussing the condition of the cities at this time; but would it not be healthfully encouraging to all Christian workers, and to all who are toiling to make the world better, if we should this morning, for a little while, look forward to the time when our cities shall be revolutionized by the Gospel of the Son of God, and all the darkness of sin and trouble and crime and suffering shall be gone from the sky, and it shall be "a morning without clouds."

Every man has pride in the city of his nativity or residence, if it be a city distinguished for any dignity or prowess. Cæsar boasted of his native Rome, Virgil of Mantua, Lycurgus of Sparta, Demosthenes of Athens, Archimedes of Syracuse, and Paul of Tarsus. I should have suspicion of baseheartedness in a man who had no especial interest in the city of his birth or residence—no exhilaration at the evidence of its prosperity, or its artistic embellishments, or its scientific advancement.

I have noticed that a man never likes a city where he has not behaved well! People who have a free ride in the prison van never like the city that furnishes the vehicle. When I find Argos and Rhodes and Smyrna trying to prove themselves the birthplace of Homer, I conclude right away that Homer behaved well. He liked them and they liked him. We must not war on laudable city pride, or with the idea of building ourselves up, at any time to try to pull others down. Boston must continue to point to its Faneuil Hall and to its superior educational advantages. Philadelphia must continue to point to its Independence Hall and its Mint and its Girard College. New York must continue to exult in its matchless harbor and its vast population and its institutions of mercy and its ever widening commerce. Washington must continue to rejoice in the fact that it is the most beautiful city under the sun.

If I should find a man coming from any city, having no pride in that city, that city having been the place of his nativity, or now being the place of his residence, I would feel like asking him right away: "What mean thing have you been doing there? what outrageous thing have you been guilty of that you do not like the place?"

Every city is influenced by the character of the men who founded it. Romulus impressed his life upon Rome. The Pilgrim Fathers will never relax their grasp from New England. William Penn left a legacy of fair dealing and integrity to Philadelphia, and you can now, any day, on the streets of that city, see his customs, his manners, his morals, his hat, his wife's bonnet and his meeting-house. So the Hollanders, founding New York, left their impression on all the following generations. So this capital of the nation is a perpetual eulogy upon the Washington who founded it.

I thank God for the place of our residence, and while there are a thousand things that ought to be corrected, and many wrongs that ought to be overthrown, while I thank God for the past, I look forward this morning to

A Glorious Future

I think we ought—and I shall take it for granted you are all interested in this great work of evangelizing the cities and saving the world—we ought to toil with the sunlight in our faces. We are not fighting in a miserable Bull Run of defeat. We are on the way to final victory. We are not following the rider on the black horse, leading us down to death and darkness and doom, but the rider on the white horse, with the moon under his feet and the stars of heaven for his tiara. Hail, conqueror, hail!

I know there are sorrows and there are sins and there are sufferings all around about us; but as in some bitter, cold winter day when we are threshing our arms around us to keep our thumbs from freezing, we think of the warm spring day that will after a while come, or in the dark winter night we look up and we see the northern lights, the windows of heaven illumined by some great victory—just so we look up from the night of suffering and sorrow and wretchedness in our cities, and we see a light streaming through from the other side, and we know we are on the way to morning—more than that, on the way to "a morning without clouds."

I want you to understand, all you who are toiling for Christ, that the castles of sin are all going to be captured. The victory for Christ in these great towns is going to be so complete that not a man on earth or an angel in heaven or a devil in hell will dispute it. How do I know? I know it just as certainly as God lives and that this is holy truth. The old Bible is full of it. The nation is to be saved; of course, all the cities are to be saved. It makes a great difference with you and with me whether we are toiling on toward a defeat or toiling on toward a victory.

Financial Prosperity

Now, in this municipal elevation of which I speak, I have to remark there will be greater financial prosperity than our cities have ever seen. Some people seem to have a morbid idea of the millennium, and they think when the better time comes to our cities and the world, people will give their time up to psalm-singing and the relating of their religious experience, and as all social life will be purified there will be no hilarity, and as all business will be purified there will be no enterprise. There is no ground for such an absurd anticipation. In the time of which I speak, where now one fortune is made there will be a hundred fortunes made. We all know business prosperity depends upon confidence between man and man. Now, when that time comes of which I speak, and all double dealing, all dishonesty, and all fraud are gone out of commercial circles, thorough confidence will be established, and there will be better business done, and larger fortunes gathered and mightier successes achieved.

The great business disasters of this country have come from the work of godless speculators and infamous stock gamblers. The great foe to business is crime. When the right shall have hurled back the wrong, and shall have purified the commercial code, and shall have thundered down fraudulent establishments, and shall have put into the hands of honest men the keys of business, blessed time for the bargain makers. I am not talking an abstraction, I am not making a guess. I am telling you God's eternal truth.

In that day of which I speak taxes will be a mere nothing. Now, our business men are taxed for everything. City taxes, county taxes, State taxes, United States taxes, stamp taxes, license taxes, manufacturing taxes—taxes, taxes, taxes! Our business men have to make a small fortune every year to pay their taxes. What fastens on our great industries this awful load? Crime, individual and official. We have to pay the board of the villains who are incarcerated in our prisons. We have to take care of the orphans of those who plunged into their graves through beastly indulgence. We have to support the municipal governments, which are expensive just in proportion as the criminal proclivities are vast and tremendous. Who supports the almshouses and police stations, and all the machinery of municipal government? The taxpayers.

Reduced Taxation

But in the glorious time of which I speak, grievous taxation will all have ceased. There will be no need of supporting criminals; there will be no criminals. Virtue will have taken the place of vice. There will be no orphan asylums, for parents will be able to leave a competency to their children. There will be no voting of large sums of moneys for some municipal improvement, which moneys, before they get to the improvement, drop into the pockets of those who voted them. No Oyer and Terminer kept up at vast expense to the people. No empanelling of juries to try theft, and arson, and murder, and slander, and blackmail. Better factories. Grand architecture. Finer equipage. Larger fortunes. Richer opulence. "A morning without clouds."

In that better time, also, coming to these cities, the churches of Christ will be more numerous, and they will be larger, and they will be more devoted to the service of Jesus Christ, and they will accomplish greater influences for good. Now, it is often the case that Churches are envious of each other, and denominations collide with each other, and even ministers of Christ sometimes forget the bond of brotherhood. But in the time of which I speak, while there will be just as many differences of opinion as there are now, there will be no acerbity, no hypercriticism, no exclusiveness.

In our great cities the churches are not to-day large enough to hold more than a fourth of the population. The churches that are built—comparatively few of them are fully occupied. The average attendance in the churches of the United States to-day is not four hundred. Now, in the glorious time of which I speak, there are going to be vast churches, and they are going to be all thronged with worshippers. Oh, what rousing songs they will sing! Oh, what earnest sermons they will preach! Oh, what they will offer! Now, in our time, what is called a fashionable church is a place where a few people, having attended very carefully to their toilet, come and sit down—they do not want to be crowded, they like a whole seat to themselves—and then, if they have any time left from thinking of their store, and from examining the style of the hat in front of them, they sit and listen to a sermon warranted to hit no man's sins, and listen to music which is rendered by a choir warranted to sing tunes that nobody knows! And then after an hour and a half of indolent yawning they go home refreshed. Every man feels better after he has had a sleep!

In many of the churches of Christ in our day the music is simply a mockery. I have not a cultivated ear nor a cultivated voice, yet no man can do my singing for me. I have nothing to say against artistic music. The two or five dollars I pay to hear one of the great queens of song is a good investment. But when the people assemble in religious convocation, and the hymn is read, and the angels of God step from their throne to catch the music on their wings, do not let us drive them away by our indifference. I have preached in churches where vast sums of money were employed to keep up the music, and it was as exquisite as any heard on earth, but I thought at the same time, for all matters practical, I would prefer the hearty, outbreathing song of a backwoods Methodist camp-meeting.

Congregational Singing

Let one of these starveling fancy songs sung in church get up before the throne of God, how would it look standing amid the great doxologies of the redeemed! Let the finest operatic air that ever went up from the church of Christ, get many hours the start, it will be caught and past by the hosanna of the Sabbath School children. I know a church where the choir did all the singing, save one Christian man who, through perseverance of the saints, went right on, and afterward a committee was appointed to wait on him and ask him if he would not please to stop singing as he bothered the choir.

Let those refuse to sing

Who never knew our God;
But children of the Heavenly King
Should speak their joys abroad.

"Praise ye the Lord: let everything with breath praise the Lord." In the glorious time coming in our cities and in the world, hosanna will meet hosanna, and hallelujah hallelujah.

In that time, also, of which I speak, all the haunts of iniquity and crime and squalor will be cleansed and will be illumined. How is it to be done? You say perhaps by one influence. Perhaps I say by another. I will tell you what is my idea, and I know I am right in it. The Gospel of the Son of God is the only agency that will ever accomplish this.

A Beautiful Chimera

Mr. Ecsler, of England, had a theory that if the natural forces of the wind and tide and sunshine and wave were rightly applied and rightly developed, it would make this whole earth a paradise. In a book of great genius, he said: "Fellow-men—I promise to show the means of creating a paradise within ten years, where everything desirable for human life may be had by every man in superabundance without labor and without pay—where the whole face of nature shall be changed into the most beautiful farms, and man may live in the most magnificent palaces, in all imaginable refinements of luxury, and in the most delightful gardens—where he may accomplish without labor in one year more than hitherto could be done in thousands of years, and may level a continent, sink valleys, create lakes, drain ponds and swamps, and intersect the land everywhere with beautiful canals and roads for transporting heavy loads of many thousand tons and for traveling a thousand miles in twenty-four hours."

"From the houses to be built will be afforded the most cultured views to be fancied. From the galleries, from the roof and from the turrets may be seen gardens as far as the eye can see, full of fruits and flowers, arranged in the most beautiful order, with walks, colonnades, aqueducts, canals, ponds, plains, amphitheatres, terraces, fountains, sculptured works, pavilions, gondolas, places of popular amusement to tire the eye and fancy. All this to be done by urging the water, the wind and the sunshine to their full development."

He goes on and gives plates of the machinery by which this work is to be done, and he says he only needs at the start a company in which the shares shall be twenty dollars each, and a hundred or two hundred thousand shall be raised just to make a specimen community, and then his being formed, the world will see its tractability and very soon two or three billion dollars can be obtained, and in ten years the whole earth will be emparadised. The plan is not so preposterous as some I have heard of! But I will take no stock in that company! I do not believe it will ever be done in that way, by any mechanical force, or by any machinery that the human mind can put into lay. It is to be done by the Gospel of the Son of God—the of love and grace and pardon and salvation. That is to emparadise the nations. Archimedes destroyed a fleet of ships coming up the harbor. You know how he did it? He lifted a great sun-lass, history tells us, and when the fleet of ships came up the harbor of Syracuse he brought to bear his sun-glass and he converged the sun's rays upon those ships. Now, the sails are wings of fire, the masts all, the vessels sink. O! my friends, by the sun-glass of the Gospel converging the rays of the Sun of Righteousness upon the sins, the wickedness of the world, we will make them blaze and expire.

In that day of which I speak, do you believe that there will be any midnight carousal? Will there be any kicking off from marble steps, of shivering mendicants? Will there be any unwashed, unfed, uncombed children? Will there be any blasphemies in the street? Will there be any inebriates staggering past? No. No breweries where they make the three X's. No bloodshot eye. No bloated cheek. No instruments of ruin and destruction. No fist-pounded forehead. The grandchildren of that woman who goes down the street with a curse, stoned by the boys that follow her, will be the reformers and the philanthropists and the Christian men and the honest merchants of our great cities.

Then, what municipal governments too, we will have in all the cities. Some cities are worse than others, but in many of our cities you just walk down by the city halls and look in at some of the rooms occupied by politicians, and see to what a sensual, loathsome, ignorant, besotted crew city politics is often abandoned. Or they stand around the City Hall picking their teeth, waiting for some emoluments of crumbs to fall to their feet.

Who are those wretched women taken up for drunkenness and carried up to the courts, and put in prison, of course? What will you do with the grogshops that made them drunk? Nothing. Who are those prisoners in jail? One of them stole a pair of shoes. That boy stole a dollar. This girl snatched a purse. All of them crimes damaging society less than twenty or thirty dollars. But what will you do with the gambler who last night robbed the young man of a thousand dollars? Nothing. What shall be done with that one who breaks through and destroys the purity of a Christian home, and with an adroitness and perfidy that beats the strategy of hell, flings a shrieking, shrieking soul into a bottomless perdition? Nothing. What will you do with those who fleece that young man, getting him to purloin large sums of money from his employer—the young man who came to an officer of my church and told the story and frantically asked what he might do? Nothing. Ah! we do well to punish small crimes, but I have sometimes thought it would be better in some of our cities, if the officials would only turn out from the jails the petty criminals, the little offenders, the ten-dollar desperadoes, and put in their places some of the who drive their roan span through the streets so swiftly that honest men have to leap to get out of the way of being run over. Oh, the damnable schemes that professed Christian men will sometimes engage in until God puts the finger of his retribution into the collar of their robe of hypocrisy and rips it clear to the bottom.

But all these wrongs are going to be righted. I expect to live to see the day. I think I hear in the distance the rumbling of the King's chariot. Not always in the minority is the Church of God going to be; or are good men going to be. The streets are going to be filled with regenerated populations. Three hundred and sixty bells rang in Moscow when one prince was married; but when Righteousness and Peace kiss each other in all the earth, ten thousand times ten thousand bells shall strike the jubilee. Poverty enriched. Hunger fed. Crime purified. Ignorance enlightened. All the cities saved. Is not this a cause worth working in?

God's love will yet bring back this ruined world to holiness and happiness. An infinite Father bends over it in sympathy. And to the orphan he will be a father, and to the outcast he will be a home, and to the poorest wretch that today crawls out of the ditch of his abominations, crying for mercy, he will be an all-pardoning Redeemer. The rocks will turn gray with age, the forests will be unmoored in the hurricane, the sun will shut its fiery eyelid, the stars will drop like blasted figs, the sea will heave its last groan and lash itself in expiring agony, the continents will drop like anchors in the deep, the world will wrap itself in sheet of flame and leap on the funeral pyre of the judgment day; but God's love will never die. It shall kindle its suns after all other lights have gone out. It will be a billowing sea after all other oceans have wept themselves away. It will warm itself by the blaze of a consuming world. It will sing while the archangel's trumpet peals and the air is filled with the crash of breaking sepulchres and the rush of the wings of the rising dead. Oh, commend that love to all the cities and the morning without clouds will come!

HUNGARY'S PICTURESQUE PEOPLE

A RECENT cablegram from Vienna, to the effect that the agrarian provinces around Leutschau, Hungary, comprising 200 square miles, are famine-stricken, is received with deep concern in this country, where there are many people of Hungarian and Austrian birth, or descent, who sympathize with afflicted friends and indeed across the water. The cable further states that disease is rampant and mortality high: some cases of bubonic foundries, factories, bell-works and other metal works at Buda-Pest and other cities are not without reputation.

Above all things, Hungary is rich in romance, in picturesqueness, in the charm that envelops a land which, adopting with the one hand new ideas in politics, freedom of the press, religious liberty and land-servant regarding it as a part of the paternal interest which shows itself most kindly and generous in many ways. In Hungary, the shepherd wears a sheepskin and pipes to his flocks on a reed. The village swineherd carries a horn.

Miss Browning, whose wanderings in Hungary have been a source of entertainment to many readers, Magyar in his white felt garments, braided or embroidered in colors; the shepherd in his sheepskin, the Alforder and Wallach in white cotton divided skirt and short blue jacket glittering with silver buttons; the long-haired Slovak in belted tunic; men in baggy blue trousers and red fezes, reminding us, as do the veiled women from Debreczin, that the Hungarian has some Turkish blood in him. There are pretty, dark-eyed, brown-skinned girls in snowy chemisettes, gay silver-clasped bodices, short skirts, aprons (which are plague and thousands of typhus are reported. Doubtless, the famine, will be promptly relieved by the Imperial Government, whose resources are more than adequate to the situation; and if the plague and fever lead, as they naturally will, to measures of sanitary education and reform (so sorely needed in some Hungarian districts), even these evils will not be without good results.

It is rather difficult to conceive of Hungary, or any part of it, as suffering from lack of food, so fertile is the soil, so varied the products, which include almost all kinds of grain. Wheat and maize, barley and rye, beans and potatoes are usually most plentiful, while of fruits and melons there is no lack. In the south, here are figs, almonds and olives, while from the Carpathians to the Alps, grapes, in due season, bend beneath red, white and purple burdens. The land is rich in minerals, and, next to agriculture, mining is the chief industry; although the ownership holds with the other to customs of feudal days, and surrenders not the glamour of mediæval song and temper to the spirit of progress Hungary is Gipsy-land; 150,000 of the merry-go-lucky, music-loving Czigany live within its borders. Despised as is the Czigany—the Hungarian of other races hates you to his dying day if you liken him to a Gipsy—the fair, or the wedding, or the funeral where his fiddle, guitar or zither is unheard is tame indeed. He is found in tents as in other lands, but what he most likes is to be a hanger-on of the Magyar noble. The relation between servants and master is primitive, indeed; sons and daughters succeed their parents in service for generations; scoldings, slaps and boxes on the ear are by no means unknown, the gives an amusing description of how one swineherd, stepping into the middle of the village square, gave a great blast on his horn which brought pigs flying from all directions. When he thought the whole company had arrived, off he strode, with his herd squealing and grunting after him like mad.

The people are noted for hospitality. Be it the Magyar noble, the Wallach peasant, or the Gipsy who has but a tent, the stranger is welcomed with warmth and grace. The peasants are very polite, and use many quaint and gracious forms of greeting and farewell, as: "I kiss your hand, honorable one!" and "God go with you!"

The picturesque Hungarian in all his variations of type and costume is best seen at Michaelmas Fair, where you may behold at one and the same time the parti-colored fringes) and quaint head-dresses, or little scarlet caps covered with jingling gold and silver coins; tall, graceful women in Greek-like draperies, wearing big gold hoops in their ears; blue-eyed, fair-haired maids hailing from the province which calls itself "Saxonland," in robes of white linen, crimson and black embroidered, strings of coral around their necks, and silver clasps at their waists. What queer, peaked hats one sees, and what an eloquent medley of colors and barbaric glitter of gold and silver buckles, earrings and bracelets delight the eye! And here where the gipsy band plays is a perfect riot of reds, greens, blues, browns and yellows! In one corner of the square a crowd gathers about a handsome young fellow who is playing the violin and singing:

With csarda hat set jauntily
And decked with perfumed rosemary,
I'll stroll down the village street.
How all the girls will smile on me!

GREEKS SEEKING JESUS

International Sunday School Lesson
for January 20th. John 12: 20-33.

THE season and the lesson both suggest the blessings of seeing and not seeing. The blessings of sight often come to mind when the blind cross our path. And when we contrast the beginning of the twentieth century with the beginning of the nineteenth, we thank God for the century plants our eyes behold on every side: emancipation, popular government, Sunday Schools, public schools, temperance societies, missions, Christian unions, none of which had more than begun to grow a hundred years ago. But there are blessings also in not seeing, which we are more likely to overlook. I will not linger on the blessings of the blind, their protection from the "lust of the eye," their shut-in hours of thought, their compensating gifts of poetry and music. I am thinking especially of the divine kindness in creating us nearsighted as to the future. We try to pry open or peep through its "closed doors in vain." We cannot tell what the new century, or the new year—not even what a day will bring forth. And it is far better so. If a year ago you had seen all your sorrows for the year you might have despaired. Or, if you had seen all your successes, you might have been spoiled with pride. The last song of P. P. Bliss is a fitting motto for our new year:

I see not a step before me
As I tread the paths of the year,
But the past is still in God's keeping,
The future his presence will cheer,
And what seems dark in the distance
Will brighten as I draw near.

So I go on not knowing,
I would not if I might;
I would rather walk in the dark with God
Than go alone in the light;
I would walk with him by faith
Than walk alone by sight.

Charles Kingsley puts in beautiful prose the meaning of the providence that shuts out the future: "Do to-day's duty, fight to-day's temptation, and do not weaken and distract yourself by looking forward to things which you cannot see, and could not understand if you saw them."

But Jesus saw the future, and so walked, all through his public life at least, in the shadow of the cross.

Finding the True Cross The hour is come. As a child looks forward to his birthday, Jesus looked ever to his death-day. Three times he spoke of his crucifixion in the first year of his ministry in words that others did not then understand. He said: "Destroy this temple and in three days I will build it up." "The bridegroom shall be taken away, and then shall they fast." "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so shall the Son of man be lifted up." The references to his cross were more numerous and more specific in the second year, and yet more so in the third. In such passages we find the true cross. Queen Helena of Rome went to Palestine and made earnest search for the wooden cross of Calvary, and claimed to find it, and made it a wooden god to worship.

But the true cross is not made of wood, but of will. Jesus is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world," because at the very hour of Adam's sin he gave himself in promise to bruise the serpent's head at the cost of his own bruising. Christ's prophecies of his own death are the real "stations of the cross." Physically, in his six hours upon the cross he suffered no more than many a martyr has suffered. To measure the true cross, we must ponder especially the mental crucifixion in Gethsemane. The journeys of Jesus make one long Via Dolorosa, during which his pure, sensitive soul saw ever the Jewish gallows, the shameful cross, that would proclaim him a criminal, looming up in his path and casting its shadow before.

Culture at the Cross Let us see what reminded him of the cross in the lesson for to-day. He was in the temple on Tuesday of what is called "Holy Week." He had taught of faith and faithfulness by the acted parable of the fruitless, and so cursed, fig tree. He had noted the giving of the widow, in whose two mites he saw the most generous "offering," because it was also a "sacrifice," that was put into the treasury of the temple that day! As he stood teaching in the court of the women, the outermost of Jewish courts, surrounded by a wall on which were inscriptions, saying that any Gentile who passed inside would forfeit his life; some Greeks, who had accepted the Jewish religion—prepared for its teachings by Socrates and Plato—and had consequently come to the

"IF ANY MAN SERVE ME, LET HIM FOLLOW ME"

Passover and were studying everything with a cultured curiosity, having heard of the wonderful words and deeds of the Prophet of Nazareth, came as near as possible and said, perhaps through one of the openings in the wall, to the nearest apostle: "Sir, we would see Jesus." The one they addressed, or at least the one who answered, was Philip, whose Greek name indicates a Greek-speaking family, though he was himself a Jew. We cannot but linger on their request. Why, we ask, did they wish to "see Jesus?" Doubtless from mixed motives. Greek curiosity, perhaps, played its part. Those who come to church and Sunday School seldom come for the sole purpose of salvation. Curiosity, willingness to please the friend who gives the invitation, these and other secondary motives may have brought them; but, in any case, let us show them Jesus, "whom having not seen, we love." We sometimes wish it were the visible Christ instead that we could see and show. But Jesus said that he was more blessed unseen than seen. "Blessed are they that have not seen [with physical vision] and yet have believed." "Greater works and words" he said he would give when he had escaped the limitations of an earthly body, and he has. Not John alone, but every loving heart can now lean upon his bosom. Not one "beloved disciple," but thousands can now walk at his side. If he were living in human flesh in Palestine only the rich could afford to travel there to see him, and most of them could not get near enough in the crowd that would throng him even to see him, much less to talk with him. But in his new, everywhere present life, millions of the poor that love him now walk and talk with him every hour. Therefore, we would see Jesus with soul rather than sight. We would see him in our sin as our Saviour. We would see him when saved, as our King and our Teacher. There are new beauties in him to see day by day. It takes a lifetime to see him in all the fulness of his being, aye, an eternity.

It is a false, though common, impression that few of the great and learned are Christians. Gladstone said that in his long public career he had mingled with most of the leading statesmen of the century, and that only three or four of them disbelieved in Christ. A generation ago many of the leading scientists were agnostics, but an increasing proportion now find God in nature, as did Sir Wm. Dawson, and Romanes, and Dana, and Winchell. "Oh, God, I think thy thoughts after thee," exclaimed Kepler, the astronomer. "The undevout astronomer is mad," exclaimed O. M. Mitchell, as he thought of God, "the millionaire of stars." Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, who shares with Morse the honor of inventing the telegraph, was as devout as he was learned. Browning and Tennyson, Whittier, and Longfellow were true prophets, singing of faith and hope and charity.

Life from Death Except a grain of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone. There was doubtless more than curiosity in those Greeks, who had already turned from idols to the living God. They yearned for what their religion had prepared them for, the manifestation of God in man. Greek gods were of human form, not horrible images, gorgons and dragons, such as most other heathens have worshiped. Their coming—these first fruits of the Gentiles—roused in Christ the vision of the great world army, of which they were but the vanguard, that was to be gathered about the cross on which he was soon to stretch out his arms in invitation to a sin-burdened world, beneath an inscription proclaiming him "King" in its three chief languages. "Now is the Son of man glorified," he cried, who was about to be crucified, and it was a cry of triumph, not of sorrow. It was a triumphal procession in whose van he saw these representatives of the foremost of Gentile nations. He saw himself not only crucified, but buried, to be multiplied like the grain of wheat, in a whitened harvest of Christians in every land of the world. And then he proclaimed that not he alone, but his follower also in every age was to lose his life to make it most fruitful. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church." And many a man who has given not death but a long unselfish life to God, has proved that unreserved giving of self is every way better than selfish getting.

Christian Service Brings Highest Honor If any man serve me, him will my Father honor. This is a period of historic review. Let young men as they review the nineteenth or the nineteen centuries, ask what sort of men the world in the long test of history delights to honor. The conqueror in the moment of victory is honored, regardless of motive and character, but as the years go by the Napoleons decrease and the Washingtons increase. The men of the past now most honored are not those who made others serve them, but those who served others and the world, especially those who some way served Christ in teaching, in art, in achievement. The most honored painters are such as Raphael, who pictured Christ. The most honored architects are such as Michael Angelo, who built grand churches for Christ. The most honored musicians are such as Handel, who sang of Christ. The great men of the nations are such as Luther and Lincoln, who served Christ in word and deed. Christian service—that is the path to honor for both worlds. Let every Christian stand against the renewed tendency to bestow highest honors on soldiering rather than service.

GOLDEN TEXT, John 12: 21:
"We would see Jesus."

Forget the battle cry; instead
Sing joyous songs of peace and trust.
Let swords that once with blood were red
Grow redder still with rust.
And give your bayonet so bright—
If you would serve the greatest good—
To make a pen wherewith to write A song of brotherhood.

—NIXON WATERMAN.

The Path to Glory Father, glorify thy name. Here we have again a reminder that those whose supreme purpose is to glorify God and who shrink not from shame and sorrow in order to do it are the very ones to whom comes highest glory even in this world. As Christ thought of the cross, the gallows of those times, even with the triumphs beyond it, his human nature shrank from the suffering, and his sinless soul shrank from the shame of being counted a criminal, and so, in Gethsemane, he cried out in pain, "Father, save me from this hour." But his higher self replied, "For this cause came I unto this hour." This is the goal toward which I have ever walked. And so rising even above the resignation that could say, "Thy will be done," he exclaimed, "Father, glorify thy name." Even in his triumph over dread of the cross, Christ gives us an example to imitate.

Who murmurs that in these dark days
His lot is cast?
God's hand within the shadow lays
The stones whereon his gates of praise
Shall rise at last.

When Christ had mentally taken up the dreaded cross, saying, "Father, glorify thy name," God answered from heaven, as at the baptism and on the mount of transfiguration. The unspiritual heard only a sound as of thunder. Nobler hearts said, "An angel spake." But John, the apostle of love, heard the very words: "I have both glorified it and I will glorify it again." God had glorified his name in Christ's unselfish life, and now he was about to glorify it again in his atoning death.

The Devil Displaced by the Cross Now shall the Prince of this world be cast out. The sign in which the devil is to be conquered in the heart and in the world is the cross. The cross is the turning point of history. There the world's trial was held. Its sin and selfishness were condemned, shown in all their awful guilt in the death of the Son of God, and sentenced to be banished. What an awful thing sin must be that God should give his only Son to save me, to save the world from it! The cross proclaims not alone salvation, but first of all the sinfulness of sin. The world still abounds in selfishness and sin, but there is less and less of it in each Christian century and in each Christian country. Nothing banishes wickedness like the cross. Many a criminal whom repeated punishment has only hardened has had the devil banished from his heart by seeing Jesus on the cross. As light casts out darkness, love's radiance from the cross banishes hatred and selfishness from the heart.

The Attractive Radiance of the Cross And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me. Some in every land of the world have felt the attraction of the cross to such an extent that they would die rather than deny him, who there died for them. It is well known that the sun and moon draw the tides up and down upon the earth. So the cross, in whose shadow Jesus walked so long, has become a radiant sun, shining in the sky, the light of the world, drawing the tides of affection in human heart wherever its story of dying love is told. As flowers also turn toward the sun and are fed by its life-giving ray, so everything that is beautiful in character, is drawn out and up by the life and death of Christ. And as the moon, whose light is borrowed from the sun, also draws the tides; so the true Christian, who reflects the unselfishness of Christ, will be a magnet to draw sinful men Christward.

REFORMING "DISCORDANT" GIRLS

A Unique and Successful Social and Educational State Experiment in California

WHAT shall we do with children who prove incorrigible, when they get beyond our control and pay no heed to entreaties or orders?" This is a question that vexes many a parental heart. When, as is sometimes the case, the incorrigible one is a daughter, whose high temper, disobedience and general propensity to mischief are a menace to the peace of the household, the problem becomes still more discouraging. There are, it is true, a number of so-called reformatory schools throughout the country, but it goes very hard indeed with parents who are compelled to send children to such places—especially girls.

One of the most interesting experiments in the direction of the reformation of "discordant" girls, is that conducted at the Whittier State School, Los Angeles, Cal., under the direction of Mrs. Adina Mitchell. This lady has made a life study of reformatory methods for juvenile delinquents, and she brings to her work rare tact and judgment, quick perception and sound common sense. She is optimistic, and believes that every child possesses innate qualities which, if encouraged and developed, would be found pleasing to others. Mrs. Mitchell, who is recognized as an authority on correctional institutional work, is a Virginian by birth. She is a lady of high Christian character. The Governor of California, some four years ago, discovered her talent in the management of refractory girls, and immediately appointed her as a trustee of the Whittier School, and she was duly elected as President of the Board. Although she receives no salary, she spares neither time or labor in her work of love. She has surrounded herself with a corps of excellent workers. This institution of correction is for boys and girls, and both departments have felt the good influence of her work; but she has felt that the girls needed her support far more than the boys did.

It was the privilege of the writer to visit the famous Whittier School recently, as the guest of the principal. Everything around the buildings is scrupulously neat and clean. There are some forty-two girls in the institution, divided into two companies, and occupying two cottages. Mrs. Mitchell gives this outline of a girl's life at Whittier: On her arrival she is received by a kindly matron, who instructs her as to our rules. She is examined by the lady physicians, and assigned a grade in the school department and industrial employment, either in housekeeping, laundry, cooking or dressmaking. Two or three girls from each cottage are detailed to help with breakfast, and others to serve at table. While one company is at school in the morning, the other is detailed for industrial work in kitchen, laundry, and general housework. School and work close at four o'clock, and until 5:30 the girls play tennis, basket-ball, or read. From morning until evening a strict watch is kept over each girl, yet not so as to offend. At 7:30 they assemble, repeat the Lord's Prayer, and after singing a good-night song, retire to their cots.

There are capable teachers in each department, each skilled in dealing with this peculiar class of pupils. Music and physical culture are fundamental factors in the training of these "discordant" natures. Looking at a delighted group of girls playing the violin, one can scarcely believe that these refined faces once belonged to incorrigibles. As Mrs. Mitchell says: "While music is an outlet for ner-the institution is calculated to influence the inmates to purer and better lives.

Many interesting experiences with "incorrigibles" might be related. A girl of Russian parentage was committed. The father was a tailor, the mother a nervous, hysterical woman, who assisted him in his work. The parents claimed that the vous energy, it at the same time leads up in an orderly way to results ahead, teaching the child to work for an end." So sight-reading, musical composition and ear-training have formed a prominent part of the reformatory course at Whittier. The girls are taught that they must live, speak and act the truth in all things; that virtue is more precious than rubies, and that life, to be worthy and successful, must be marked by fixed purpose and concentrated will along certain lines of effort. Every opportunity is seized to instill Christian principles, and the whole atmosphere of girl was so violent in temper that they could not control her. Upon returning from school, she would jerk the tablecloth from the table, throw the dishes about, and act in a most excitable manner, using abusive and profane language. To pacify her the mother would buy her anything in her power. Afflicted with a nervous trouble, the girl kept her face in a state of constant contortion. After three months' experience at the school, there was not a sign of her nervous fault. She had been almost transformed, and had become a rational, thinking creature.

Another instance: Marie, a little, incorrigible was sent to the Whittier school. Sly, cunning, quick, she would pull off her shoes and stockings, jump through the open window, and evade capture for hours. Now she is docile, kind, intelligent, conscientious, and affectionate. An expert in calisthenics, and proficient in housework—a transformation wrought by love, patience, and education.

Upon entering the school the child is given 150 merits, a gray dress to wear, and is placed in the second grade. Each day, if perfect in deportment, school and industrial work, she receives 10 merits. This makes a possible 300 in a month, to which is added 5 per cent. No percentage is given for less than 300 merits. It is possible to earn 10 extra merits for some extraordinary service. Three months of perfect deportment places a child in the first grade, and she is given white collar and cuffs. Beside this mark, she is qualified to be placed on the parole list, and is made sub-head of some department with a salary of $2.50 a month. If she loses enough merits to put her in the lowest grade she forfeits her salary. Five thousand merits earned entitle a child to honorable discharge from the school. Demerits are given for disobedience, untidiness, loud laughter, slang, falsehood and the breaking of any rules. They vary from 5 to 5,000, the latter being for running away. With 50 demerits in one month the child must wear a blue dress, is placed in third grade and loses all privileges. She may not receive or write letters, see those who are permitted to visit her, or leave the grounds except to go to church. While wearing the blue dress she receives but five merits a day and no percentage. If she is in the blue dress the second month, only three merits a day, and the third month nothing. For extraordinary misbehavior, the offender is locked in the "room of meditation." Here she is left to herself. She is given plenty of bread and milk, for starving does not help anybody. And it doesn't take many hours for a girl to "meditate" herself into a better mood.

After the girls have left the school the influence of their training still goes on, and they are aided in finding employment and friends, advised and encouraged, and in every way assisted to live good, pure, noble lives.

Consecrated Gifts

ONE of the most gratifying features of the contributions to the fund for the support of the destitute orphans of India, is the number of contributors who have never before given anything to missionary work. It is surprising how many people have said, in sending their pledge for the support of an orphan, that, although they have heretofore turned a deaf ear to the appeals for money for the propagation of the Gospel among the heathen, their compassion has been awakened by the thought of these fatherless and homeless children. We are glad to receive such contributions, not only on account of their direct value to the cause, but because of their indirect benefit to the givers. Like the quality of mercy, of which the poet wrote, every such gift is twice blessed: "It blesseth him that gives and him who takes." When a man has once learned by experience the joy there is in giving, he is apt to continue the good practice. Thus THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been engaged unconsciously in a campaign of education. It has introduced into some lives an element of happiness that was not there before. It is a law of our being that no one can do good to another without a feeling of love to that other, and love brings happiness. There are now thousands of people whose hearts are warmed by the thought of little waifs on the other side the world, who are being fed and clothed and educated through their bounty. Having once experienced that pleasure, they are likely to want more of it, and there is an abundance of opportunity. We believe that in the future the missionary societies and other beneficent enterprises, will have a host of new supporters who first learned, by maintaining an orphan in India, how true were Christ's words: "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

We trust that no Christian who has been in the habit of contributing to the Missionary Society of his church will curtail his usual subscription on account of this orphan work. The missionary societies need more money, not less; on account of these new duties they have assumed. The maintenance of an orphan should be regarded as a special privilege, that should be over and above the ordinary contributions. Like the alabaster box of very precious ointment that Mary broke in honor of her Lord, this pledge of support for an orphan is a tribute of love and consecration—something done for love of Christ. That in many cases it will involve economy and self-sacrifice, we are aware, but it would lose all its beauty and merit if other Christian work suffered for it. By sacrificing some luxury, or time, or labor in order to fulfil the obligation, the giver becomes a hero, and Christ smiles on him in approbation and accepts the sacrifice; but to take money ordinarily given to a Missionary Society and devoting it to this special work would be to throw the burden on Christ's cause. The blessing comes to those who, like David, say, "I will not offer to the Lord that which cost me nothing."

Another Ordination

THERE are hundreds of thousands of men who will never come to church. The only kind of pulpit that will reach them is a dry-goods box or a drayman's cart at the street corner. We want hundreds of men every Sabbath to be preaching the Gospel in our great city parks. "What!" you ask, "would you let them preach without ordination?" I answer: If Conferences and Presbyteries will not put their hands upon your head, then I would have you ordained in another way. I would take you down into the haunts of suffering and crime within ten minutes' walk of our best churches, and there have you tell the story of Christ, until men, redeemed from their cups, and women, elevated from a life of degradation, and children, whose bare, bleeding feet are on the roads to death, should be by your instrumentality saved. Then I would have these converted suffering ones put their hands of ordination on your head, setting you apart for the holy ministry in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Ah! that would be an ordination as good as the laying on of hands by Conferences and Synods—an ordination that would be most bright in the day when,

"Shrivelled like a parched scroll,
The flaming heavens together roll."

"Damnation of Infants"

A SAD letter comes to this office from a lady who was once a Baptist, but is now a Presbyterian. Since joining the Presbyterian Church, she says she has discovered that that Church believes in the damnation of infants, and as her three children have died, she is distressed beyond measure by the aforesaid doctrine. My reply is, that there is not a good man in the Presbyterian Church or any other Church who believes in the damnation of infants. If any good man ever announced such a theory by voice or pen, he was, to say the least, a religious crank, however many talents he may have possessed. We hereby offer a liberal reward for the name of any man of sound mind and good character who will state that he believes in the damnation of infants.

In the census which the Bible gives of the inhabitants of heaven, the children are in so large majority that it is distinctly a children's heaven. What else can you make of the saying of Christ, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven?" In that world the adults are in the minority. More children in the house of many mansions, and in the temple, and in the street, and in the towers, than souls of men and women. Let not our correspondent, or any reader of these lines, fear about the destiny of their little ones. I wish that all those of us who have come to manhood or womanhood were as certain of heaven as are the babies. No mother ever took a sick child out of a cradle so gently and lovingly as Christ lifts the dying infant out of the pain of croup or scarlet fever into the raptures before the throne. Indeed the better world is so full of children that if you do not like children you had better stay out of heaven. The Presbyterian Church will at the next meeting of its General Assembly send flying that passage in their creed which allows any uncertainty about the future happiness of any infant. My theory is that the offensive lines in that creed were either an interpolation by some one who wanted to make religion obnoxious, or that through inadvertence, or a hearty desire on the part of the members to get to their homes, that weak plank of the religious platform was allowed to stay. A swarm of flies and mosquitoes in Philadelphia on the 4th of July, 1776, hastened the adjournment of the convention that was making the Declaration of Independence, and those who were signing the document had to put down their pen to scratch the inflamed cuticle, and some disturbance not reported may have hastened the adjournment of the Holy Fathers who were preparing a creed for the Presbyterians of all centuries. Or it may be that some "prentice hand" put in its work while the old Theologians were asleep in their chairs after their exhausting labors in explaining the Eternal Decrees.

AS announced in previous issues, the proprietor of this journal purposes to award, once a week, a medal for the most meritorious case of personal bravery occurring during each week in the year. The first medal awarded will be for the most deserving act of heroism taking place in the first week of January, 1901. Every reader is invited to forward to us earliest information of any deed of true heroism, occurring in his own locality. Send accounts only of thoroughly authentic cases, and tell the story from personal knowledge, not from hearsay. A committee in New York will meet once a week and, on investigating the facts presented, will decide which case is most deserving of recognition. This award is not for heroism in the line of paid professional duty, but for that which is absolutely voluntary and spontaneous, and without emolument. The medal is of bronze, of elegant design. On one side is the inscription: "For Christ and Humanity. CHRISTIAN HERALD, N. Y.," and on the other side, "This medal was struck in commemoration of the heroism of in saving life on 1901."

In addition to this award, honorable public mention will also be made, weekly, of others who have distinguished themselves in an heroic way in the same period, and whose names, together with the story of their heroism, have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The medal is intended as a recognition of such humble every-day heroes as the man who saves the life of a drowning child, the woman who flags an express train and averts a holocaust, the youth who seizes a mad, runaway team, or he who rescues human beings in peril of fire, flood, or danger in any of its manifold forms. Not a week passes without some such brilliant deed, that brings a thrill to all hearts. There are hundreds of just such heroes, men and women, whose acts deserve enduring reward and commemoration.

Remember, the first CHRISTIAN HERALD medal for heroism will be awarded for the most meritorious act of bravery occurring between January one and January seven. Every reader is invited to forward to us, at once, an account of any act of true heroism that took place last week, or that may take place this week, or any other week this year. Give the exact date, as only cases happening on or after January 1, 1901, will be considered. To give the committee time to satisfy all inquiries, to investigate all claims, and to allow time for stamping the medal, some weeks must elapse after the event before the medal can be awarded. Address all letters on this subject to Chairman, Medal Committee, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

Honor Your Denomination!

LIKE a great army, the Church of Christ has its corps and its battalions, its brigades and its regiments, its companies and its platoons. It is under many division commanders, and each separate regiment has its individual battle-flags; but whatever the device, the Cross is over all. Every soldier in this great army owes, as a first duty, loyal adherence to the particular command in which he serves. Failing this, he is worth little to the army or the cause. Unity of action and the success that comes from that unity, can only be secured by loyal and intelligent cooperation, each with his own immediate command. That soldier most honors the general who does his duty well and faithfully in the ranks to which he belongs.

* * * *

Honor your denomination! It matters not whether it be Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregational, Lutheran, Reformed, or any other of the great denominational bodies of Christian soldiers, serving in the field against sin, and under the leadership of our great Captain-General, Jesus. All, in their respective places, have equal responsibilities and equal recognition, for our General loves all his soldiers of the Cross. Looking upon the familiar flag of his own regiment, a true soldier feels his heart thrill within him. Mayhap it is torn and tattered, battle-shot and shredded, giving evidence of hard service, but its presence never fails to rouse the veteran to enthusiasm. So, to the soldier of the Cross, the emblem of the command in which he has served is endeared by many tender and stirring memories. It is the same command in which his father and mother and their ancestors served before him. Amid storm and struggle, and through all the assaults of the enemy, it has upheld the old standard of the Gospel and preserved the citadel of the Word. Well does it deserve the love and loyal adherence of its followers.

* * * *

Honor your denomination! Honor it by the broad liberality with which you regard the other branches of the great Christian army. Be generous enough to believe that all Christianity is not centred under your own denominational flag, and that other regiments in the service of our Captain-General, Jesus, may perform equally meritorious duty. In adopting this generous attitude, you reflect the greatest credit upon the cause which all espouse, and you honor its Leader. There are times and occasions also, when opportunities are afforded you to do special service on the picket line, or on a reconnaissance, far from your own command. These opportunities take you into new fields, they confer new experiences and bring new honors; but the duty performed, you return to your own ranks—go back again to the old fold. The follower of Christ is free to enlarge his sphere of service and to make it as wide as he may. He can assist a good cause by the way, but he does not neglect the duty he owes to his own church. He can reach out hands of help to Cuba, or to the famine orphans of India, or to the suffering and stricken in the remotest parts of the earth, but never at the expense of the duty he owes to his own church. If it be true that he who neglects to provide for his own household is worse than an infidel, it is equally certain that he who allows his denomination to suffer, while he bestows his energies and resources in other quarters, is guilty of serious neglect of duty.

* * * *

Honor your denomination then, by full and loyal service and support. Make your adherence real, your zeal substantial. Be as broad as you will, extend your charities to the furthest pole, and do all the good you can in your lifetime and with the means at your command. The Christian is free to live up to all his privileges, and to seize every opportunity to advance the cause. Such an example is contagious; it is a Gospel of itself. This is demonstrated by the fact that the thousands of denominational Christians who, in addition to their ordinary church calls have aided in the alleviation of famine in India and in the support of the famine orphans, have set an example which has been followed by a great army of consecrated men and women, who are now generously aiding the same noble work. There is ample evidence to show that a very large proportion of the latter class, allied to no church or denomination, were stimulated to participating in this world-wide benevolence solely by the example of those denominational Christians who voluntarily did double service, in act and gift, to save life and to rescue the perishing orphans of India.

Immigrants' Hotel

AFTER more than three years of cramped accommodations, the Immigration Bureau in New York has taken possession of its new home. Since the fire which in 1897 destroyed the former immigrant station, the business of the department has been conducted at the old Barge Office, which, with its grime and gloom, was better fitted for herding cattle than for the reception of human beings. But now the new building, of which a picture appears on this page, is finished and the bureau has been installed. It is of brick picked out with Indiana limestone and Maine granite. The interior arrangements show the result of long experience in handling crowds of strangers. The immigrant, on landing, passes through the medical department, where he is examined, to see that he does not bring any contagious disease into the country. Thence he passes up a flight of stone stairs into the general examination room. This is a lofty room, having a gallery running around its sides about half way between floor and ceiling, for the use of visitors. The floor is of concrete and the walls of white hard-surfaced plaster. Narrow passages divide the room, so as to allow the immigrants to pass in single file. One passage is for those intending to remain in New York, and the others for those going away by rail, according to their destinations. On their way through the passages, they confront the inspectors, who ask their age, their nationality, their condition, whether married or single, their occupation, the amount of money they bring, whether they have friends in the country, and various other inquiries. Uncle Sam's hospitality has been abused so often that he has become more particular as to the kind of guests he will receive. He objects to elopers, and not infrequently excludes wives who have deserted their husbands in Europe to come here. He also objects to people who have been in prison, people who are likely to drift to the poor-house, mechanics whose passage-money has been paid by employers on this side, and others who are regarded as undesirable. Their tickets are marked "S. I." as cases for Special Inquiry, and they are turned into a lane which takes them to a room where a Board will consider their condition, and will probably mark their tickets "Debarred," and return the immigrants to the ship that brought them here, to be taken back at the expense of the shipping company. The immigrants who pass the ordeal and are going West are taken to the proper railroad depot, their tickets bought and their baggage checked, so as to protect them from sharpers, who might take advantage of their ignorance. Their fellow voyagers, who are debarred, envy their good fortune, and often shed bitter tears as they see them go away. Happily, some of the disqualifications which cause their exclusion from this country will not exclude them from heaven if they seek to enter. The poor and the blind and the lame and the repentant sinner are all welcome there, for the invitation is very wide.

Tim that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out (John 6: 37).

The Kidnapped Boy

The daring crime perpetrated recently at Omaha has astonished the whole country. The fifteen-year-old son of a wealthy resident of that city, while returning home in the early evening from an errand, was forced into a carriage, blindfolded and gagged, and was driven to a lonely house in the suburbs. His father was then informed by a letter, thrown into his garden, that the boy was held for ransom. His captors promised to release him if the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars was promptly paid. Otherwise the boy would be blinded with acid and afterwards killed. After a vain effort to find the place where the boy was concealed, the father accepted the conditions. As directed in the letter, he filled a sack with gold eagles and double eagles and drove out alone, along a certain road, till he came to a place where a lantern was hanging from a stick. There he deposited the sack of gold and then drove back home. In a few hours his son was returned to him safe and sound. During the interval he had been chained in the empty house like a dog, and had been in constant fear of death. The father felt deeply the humiliation of paying the ransom, and he was conscious of the risk to his own life that phenomenon, but when it occurs in the spiritual experience there is no difficulty in understanding it.

We glory in tribulation also, knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts (Rom. 5: 3).

The Senate and the Treaty

Prolonged debate, both in the Senate and the press, has been caused by the amendments proposed in the treaty between this country and Great Britain, on the Nicaraguan Canal which is projected across the isthmus of Panama. Only three have been passed by the Senate, but those three are important. By the first, the existing treaty, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, is superseded. By the second, the United States acquires an indefinite right to fortify the canal. By the third, it dispenses with the provision that European governments should be invited to agree to the treaty. It is diffi-to give such an order as, in another matter, was given by the ancient prophet:

Cast ye up, cast ye up, prepare the way, take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people (Isa. 57: 14).

A Husband Under Bonds

A country justice in New Jersey was called upon a few days ago to register a bond for good behavior which a young married man desired to execute. He explained to the justice that he had, before his marriage, been accustomed to go to questionable places of amusement occasionally; but when he became engaged to be married he had given up the habit in deference to the scruples of the lady, who was a pious girl. Shortly after the marriage he was in New York on business, and the desire came upon him to visit some of his old haunts. He did not return to his home that night, and when he went home the following day he was horror-stricken to find that his wife had packed up her belongings and gone back to her father's house. He went there and begged her to return, but the only condition on which she would do so was that he should execute an agreement which she dictated. It ran: "To whom it may concern: In consideration of the fact that my wife allows me to return home to reside there and enjoy her companionship, love and care, I do hereby promise to begin anew, treat my wife properly, and return home before ten o'clock when not abroad on mutual engagements. I do promise further to attend prayer meeting, to abstain from intoxicating liquors, also from tobacco and cigars, and in future to conduct myself strictly in a decent, sober, orderly manner." He signed this document and the justice certified it. It may be supposed that this will satisfy the lady and that she will now return. Her husband now realizes the conditions on which alone he can expect to retain her companionship. It would be well if those who hope to enter heaven when they die, were to make a like discovery. They cannot hope for union with Christ, which is necessary to their desire, except by renouncing the world.

Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity (II. Tim. 2: 19).

BRIEF NOTES

$25,000 was sent by Dr. Klopsch to India last week, to pay the expense of supporting, for another four months, the 5,000 destitute orphans for whose maintenance THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has made itself responsible.

Evangelist C. H. Yatman, celebrated at Albany, N. Y., recently, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the beginning of his Christian life and work. At a congratulatory meeting he gave a review of his travels and labors.

Our readers will enjoy the perusal, on page 38 of this issue, of the article describing the Bowery Mission's Christmas celebration. Eight thousand poor families in New York were made happy by the receipt of parcels containing a good Christmas dinner.

Bishop Sbarretti, whom the Cuban Catholics are endeavoring to depose, because he is an Italian and not a Cuban, has issued an order threatening suspension of all priests who attend or participate in meetings held in opposition to him, whether that opposition be direct or indirect.

An experiment in church work which has succeeded in the Washington Square Methodist Church, New York, may be commended to other churches. This is a service specially for children, held on Friday afternoons. The pastor, Dr. J. J. Reed, takes pains to make the service varied and interesting. The children are delighted with it.

The first place to see the dawn of the twentieth century was Antipodes Island. The next was Bounty Island; then North Island, New Zealand, and then the Fiji Group. Six and a half hours later it reached Calcutta. London saw it in twelve and a half hours; in seventeen hours and twenty minutes it reached New York, and three hours afterwards the Golden Gate.

he ran in driving out alone to the place appointed; but his boy's eyesight and probably his life were at stake, and he willingly risked his life and sacrificed his property to save him. That boy can never doubt his father's love and it may be hoped that his future life will show that he appreciates it. It would be very sad if he should act as some men do, whom God redeemed at infinitely greater cost.

Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ (I. Peter 1: 18, 19).

Pain Without Suffering

In an interview with a leading physician of New Orleans, published in the Times Democrat, the doctor averred his belief that certain patients, while under anesthetics actually feel pain though they do not suffer from it. "Ether and some other anesthetics," he said, "when administered to certain patients prevent suffering without destroying the consciousness of pain. That sounds like a paradox, and is somewhat difficult to explain without becoming more paradoxical still. The effect of the anæsthetic, in the cases to which I refer, is to render pain pleasant. While apparently insensible, the patient is fully conscious of everything that is going on, and the nerves respond as readily as ever, but instead of producing physical discomfort the effect is exactly the reverse. I have encountered several anomalies of that kind." The doctor could not explain the cult to understand the motives of the Senators in insisting on these amendments, unless, as their detractors assert, they were anxious to prevent the construction of the canal on any terms. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty which the present treaty now supersedes, contained clauses very valuable to us. Among them was a practical acceptance on the part of Great Britain of the Monroe doctrine. It contained also provisions of great value to us relating to the Central American Republics, and also bound Great Britain to assist in an emergency in the preservation of the canal. The privilege of fortifying the canal is of little value, inasmuch as the preservation of its integrity would naturally be secured by our fleet and not by guns on land. The third amendment involves the necessity of securing by force an end which might have been secured by diplomacy. That these changes were made and were advocated by some Republican Senators is the more remarkable, because the treaty was not the joint production of the two Governments but was prepared by Mr. Hay alone, and was accepted by Great Britain without alteration. The changes therefore are a snub to Mr. Hay, which must cause him no little chagrin. Whether Great Britain will accept the treaty in its amended form remains to be seen. The canal would be so useful to all maritime nations, especially to us, that we may hope all obstacles to its construction will eventually be removed. It will be a good day for our nation when the President is able

TOLSTOI'S GOSPEL OF LOVE AND SELF-DENIAL

CAST OUT BY THE RUSSIAN CHURCH, YET HIS ONLY DESIRE IS TO FOLLOW CHRIST

THERE is living at the present time in Central Russia, about six hours by rail south of Moscow, a venerable old man who has been trying with all his might for twenty years past to live the

ERNEST H. CROSBY

Christ-life, and now the news comes that he has been excommunicated by the Russian Church and that the Metropolitan of Kieff, the Archbishop Joannicus, has addressed a circular to all the archbishops and bishops of Russia warning them not to give him the privileges of the Church in life or in death. A strange thing, is it not, that a man whose whole desire is to follow Christ should be cast out by the Church that bears his name!

And who is this old man against whom poor, impotent Joannicus has now done his worst? Leo Nikolaevitch Tolstoi is a representative of one of the old and noble families of Russia. Born in 1828, he was brought up as a nobleman's son, and in due time became a student at the great University of Kazan. He gave up his studies there suddenly, and the story which they tell of him to account for his departure throws a light upon his whole life. One bitter winter night he went to a ball at a nobleman's house in the neighborhood of Kazan. When he entered the house he left the sleigh which had brought him, with its peasant coachman, outside to wait for him. He passed the night in feasting and dancing, thinking of nothing but his own pleasure. When in the early morning he was about to return to the city, he found that his coachman was nearly frozen to death. For several hours the man lay unconscious, and it was only by the most strenuous efforts, by continuous chafing of his arms and legs and the administering of every remedy at hand, that his life was saved. The mind of young Tolstoi was much struck by this dramatic incident. It seemed to present to him a picture of the society in which he lived. There was he, a young nobleman with all the money he could use, although he had never been of any use to anybody, going into the warm, gay and brilliant house to pass the night in costly amusement, while his driver, the representative of the great working-class, which builds the houses and prepares the food and drink, and does the hard manual work of the world, was shut out there in the cold, and not allowed to enter into the luxury which he and his fellows had produced by their toil. Tolstoi left the University, for he could no longer find it in his heart to devote himself selfishly to his own intellectual improvement, while the great mass of his countrymen were in poverty and want.

For some years he applied himself to the management of his estates, trying to ameliorate the condition of his serfs, but it was discouraging work, and he was finally induced to drop it, and go into the army. He served in the Crimean War, and took part as captain of artillery in the defence of Sebastopol, and while in active service he began to write short stories and novels. In this literary work he had instant success. His books were praised by the critics, and read eagerly by the novel-readers of St. Petersburg and Moscow. When the war came to a close, Tolstoi was already a famous author, and the career of a great writer was open before him. He made his home now at St. Petersburg, and was received with open arms by the literary and fashionable circles of the capital. He frequented the clubs and theatres, went to balls and dinner-parties, gambled, fought duels, drank, and led generally the dissipated life which is the rule among men of his class on the banks of the Neva. But still he found no peace for his soul in all these diversions. At bottom he was always a serious man, longing to lead a good life, and not knowing how to set to work about it. He had long since lost faith in the formal religion of the Russian Church, and he did not know where to look for a true religion. He traveled abroad, and sought to discover the secret of right living from the learned men whom he met in France and Germany and England, but he received little help from them. When the serfs

Tolstoi as he was at fifty. He is a rich man with large landed estates. He is an aristocrat, a member of a noble family. He is one of the most distinguished writers of the world and his books are translated into all the principal languages. He has a devoted wife and a fine family of children growing up around him. Would it be possible to find a man more happily situated? And yet he tells us that at fifty he could scarcely keep himself from committing suicide. He felt he had no religion, did not know what he was living for, saw nothing in the future but death.

But Tolstoi was no coward, and suicide is cowardice. He made up his mind to find the truth if truth was to be found. He began to read and study; he applied to his friends, to the professors in the colleges, and the priests in the churches. For several years he struggled with the great questions of life and death, of good and evil, but he obtained little satisfaction. He was a practical man, and he wanted a practical religion that would change the life of those that professed it, but as he looked around him he saw religious people living much like the irreligious. He was sure that they were deceiving themselves with their forms and ceremonies. He set to work then upon the study of the Gospels for himself and tried to permeate his mind with the spirit of the teachings of Jesus. He became particularly attracted by the Sermon on the Mount, and read it again and again, and gradually its meaning grew clearer and clearer to him. He became convinced that the kernel of the Gospel was love, love for God and love for men, love extending to our enemies and to those that hate and persecute us, a love so strong that it would prevent us under all circumstances from using violence against them, a love shining like the sun of heaven on the evil and on the good, on the just and on the unjust. This conviction grew stronger and stronger in Tolstoi's consciousness until it filled his whole life. All idea of suicide passed away. He was filled with a great joy, and he determined to dedicate the remainder of his days to such works of love as he could perform. He looked upon his past life in the light of his new love, and he felt profoundly disgusted with it. Was it possible to love his neighbor as himself and go on living in luxury while his neighbors were overwhelmed by poverty? Was it consistent with Christ's teaching for him to live as one of a small society of rich and aristocratic people, scorning nine-tenths of mankind as their inferiors, refusing to sit at table with them or to regard them as brothers, and these too the very people who provided them with the necessities and luxuries of life? No, it was not. He would have done with it all. He would cease to separate himself from the mass of his fellows by his dress, his manners and his occupations, and he would admit himself to be what God made him, a simple human being like all the rest. Accordingly he began to simplify his way of living, to wear a peasant's clothes, to work with his hands, to do without the luxuries to which he had been accustomed. His love extended beyond men to the animal world. He did not take up shooting again, for he would not find pleasure in causing pain, and there are so many pleasures which hurt no one! He stopped eating meat, for he did not like the idea of slaughtering animals, and he soon found, as many others have done, that he was just as well and strong on a vegetarian diet as he had been before on a flesh diet. He went on writing as a literary man, but no longer for fame or for money, but rather to make his new discovery known to the world, namely, that people would be happy if they obeyed the commandment of Jesus, to love each other.

I had the great pleasure of visiting him at his country home in 1894, when he had already been leading this life for a dozen years. In his peasant's blouse, with his patriarchal beard, his kindly searching eyes, his frank and sincere manner, his geniality, and his seriousness withal, he looked as the early Christians must have looked, and the love which had become the essence of his life was evident in every word and gesture. A little story of an event which occurred a day or two before my arrival will show how he exerts his influence in his own family. It was told me by the governess who was living with the Tolstoi family, and who saw it with her own eyes. His little daughter Sacha, ten years old, had been out in front of the house playing with one of the peasant boys from the village. They had quarreled and the boy had struck her with a stick on the arm, making it quite black and blue. She came running in to her father to complain of him, the tears coursing down her face.

"Oh, papa, whip this naughty boy."

The Count took her up on his lap and wiped her eyes and reasoned with her.

"Why, Sacha, what good would it do to whip him? He struck you because he was angry, hated you. If I whip him he will hate you more than ever and hate me too. Wouldn't it be better to make him love us? I tell you what I would do if I were you. I would go to the pantry and get some of that raspberry jam that we had for lunch and take it out to him."

And this she actually did, and if I know anything of human nature there was far more chance of that boy's turning out a good man than if he had received the whipping which he doubtless deserved.

It is true that Tolstoi has used stout language in criticising the Church; but tried by the standard of love, did it not deserve it? If he receives the same treatment from the Church that the apostles received, who were scourged and put out of the synagogues, is it not proof that he is really walking in the steps of Jesus?

It was shortly after this that he married, and for ten or fifteen years his domestic relations, the needs of a large family, the management of his estates, the composition of his great books, Anna Karenina and War and Peace, so engrossed his attention that he was able to silence the demands of his soul for a truly religious conception of life.

THE ANTI-SALOON MOVEMENT IN 35 STATES

By REV. NORMAN PLASS, Superintendent of New York District

EVEN years have elapsed since the Anti-Saloon League was organized, and it is now in active operation in thirty-five States. It has achieved great success in these seven years. Its leaders include nearly two hundred men, who resigned successful and influential pastorates to devote themselves exclusively to the work. At the outset of their campaign in New York State the League leaders said: "Give us two years in which to agitate and organize, and then for the fight!" The two years are not yet ended, but 2,500 rallies have been held in churches of twenty denominations, 500,000 people have been addressed, tens of thousands have formally identified themselves with the movement, the fighting forces of 300 committees have been organized, and many other places are marshaling their men for the campaign.

In the person of Rev. J. Q. A. Henry, D.D., the Anti-Saloon movement has an experienced leader. He has as his Board of Stratagem more than thirty of the most prominent clergymen and laymen in the State, chosen from all denominations, with Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler, D.D., as their honorary head. Truman H. Baldwin, Esq., is President of the Board; Rev. Drs. R. S. McArthur, S. Parkes Cadman and I. K. Funk are its Vice-Presidents, while other clergymen and laymen equally prominent are members. The League presents a united front against a divided and scattered foe. It arouses the people to their danger. Enough temperance sentiment exists, if only it can be drafted and stationed in the ranks.

The League secures better legislation, introducing bills, using its influence for eighteen, who owe their election to the Anti-Saloon League, and are pledged to support its measures.

The immediate legislative programme franchised upon the temperance question. There is a growing demand all over the State for municipal local option, and the League is endeavoring to secure 500,000 signatures to a petition for such a measure.

Truth is, the League stands for the maintenance of law. All that it does in the line of enforcing the law is calculated to re-enforce the officers, and compel obedience on the part of the law-breakers. It has its own attorneys and secret service men, and is fully equipped for law enforcement work. At the present time, it has three hundred cases in the courts of the State, and has secured a number of criminal convictions besides revoking liquor tax certificates by civil process. It has secured convictions on gambling slot-machines found in saloons of Poughkeepsie and Glens Falls, and in Buffalo. It has been the means of abolishing iniquitous "dives." An amendment to the Buffalo city charter has been secured, which provides that with the first day of next May, when the Pan-American Exposition opens, fifty-three of those dens of vice shall go out of existence forever!

The League aims to be constructive in its methods as well as destructive. It has maintained a roof-garden in New York City during the past summer, which was patronized by tens of thousands of people in a densely-populated portion. While fighting to suppress, the League stands ready to accept the maxim of Napoleon that "to displace is to conquer." It believes in the open church to offset the open dramshop, and is heart and soul in the movement for that purpose.

THE AMERICAN CHURCH IN BERLIN

TO a majority of the Americans who visit Germany, the American Church in Berlin is well known. It was founded forty years ago under the leadership of Governor Wright, of Indiana, who was United States Minister to the Court of Prussia. In all these years it has never had a building of its own; its congregation worships in a hired hall in a back court. It has no pew rents, no endowment fund, and receives help from no church board or society, its sole source of revenue being the voluntary offerings given by those who gather together for worship week by week.

REV. DR. J. F. DICKIE

Pastor of the American Church in Berlin

The American Church in Berlin is organized on a broad and liberal basis, wide enough for all American Christians to stand upon. Its doctrinal belief is the Word of God and the articles of the Apostles' Creed. It contains in its membership all denominations of Christians, from Quakers to High Church Episcopalians. In the early years of its history, President Tappan ministered to it; later, Joseph P. Thompson, of the Broadway Tabernacle. One whole winter, Phillips Brooks alternated with President McLean, of Nebraska. At a great crisis in its history, Henry Van Dyke did yeoman service and saved the Church from dissolution. Professor Stuckenberg served the Church from 1880 to 1894, when the present pastor succeeded.

The American Church ministers to a colony of about two thousand Americans, mostly students. They form a very earnest and intellectual body, but neither professors nor students are rich in this world's goods, and the Church can do no more than raise the modest salary of the pastor. Earnest efforts have been made to secure a building, the progress and prosperity of the Church depending upon it. The Church has given and labored and prayed and begged toward this end. What hopes and fears and sighs and heartaches and discouragements and hopes deferred, that make the heart sick, have entered into its experience!

A lot suitable for church building has been secured on Nottendorf Platz, in Berlin, costing $40,000, and this has been paid for. The Church believed that it had raised enough money to build at once, but on examining the bids, found that $15,000 would still be needed to complete the building without debt.

"So eager is the Church to see the building begun," said the Rev. J. F. Dickie, the pastor, "that we were ready to have the contract signed and ground broken at once, believing that 'for a web begun God sends the thread.' But we have no permanent community behind us. We preach to a procession, and a debt would be disastrous."

In these circumstances, it was decided to send the pastor with this message to the American people: "We have secured our lot. We have successfully overcome all the difficulties in the way of our building, and have complied with all the punctilios of the Prussian law (and they are legion), and we will sign the contract and begin at once if you aid us in raising the $15,000 still needed."

It has frequently been a matter of comment in Berlin, that whilst other foreign colonies have church buildings there, America, which has the largest and the most important colony, has no church home. Its morning service is held in a hall; its Sunday School in a private house, its Young People's meeting in a third-story room, and its evening service in the pastor's house. Surely a work like this needs and deserves equipment.

The church now proposed to be built will worthily represent America yet will not be too costly. It will have an audience room for six hundred; a church home containing reading-room and library, and a large hall for social gatherings. These young people, far away from home, in the narrow quarters of a foreign boarding-house, need just such a social centre as the American church house will be.

Those who know the needs best heartily commend the movement. Hon. A. D. White, Ambassador, says: "I commend the cause of our American Church in Berlin to all who are interested in the moral and religious interests of our American young people." Mrs. Grover Cleveland, who was the first treasurer of the building fund, says, "Every American should help a work so national and patriotic."

It is hoped that, with the aid of generous Christians at home, the American church in Berlin may become an established station of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, equipped for its peculiar mission, and that it may be a centre for the social and religious life of our own sons and daughters, far away from home, amid all the loneliness and temptations of a great European city.

Contributions in aid of the completion of the American church in Berlin, will be gratefully received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and all others who are interested in this most deserving project. All contributions should be addressed to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and every gift will be acknowledged personally by Dr. Dickie.

TOLD AROUND THE HEARTH

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

DEPENDENT AND DELINQUENT CHILDREN

IN the complex relations of our modern life, few questions are more difficult to answer, few situations harder to adjust, than the complications which arise over orphaned children and juvenile culprits. The State honestly does its best, and philanthropic people endeavor to aid it, but it is not enough to feed and clothe children, to give them a trade, or a measure of book knowledge. Beyond these good things there must be a whole world of love, of ministration to the need of the individual, of praising, encouraging, petting, coaxing and praying, most of which the State finds out of its province. When the State finds for its wards a home in a family it does better for them and more for their future than when it brings them up in one of its institutions. Charitable organizations succeed better than others, because they do bring to bear personal affection and enthusiasm.

Undoubtedly the wing of the compassionate Saviour broods over many an orphanage. What would the waifs of Galveston do without the loving provision which has been made for them? For the famine orphans of India a beautiful outlook is made, because Christians are planning for their upbringing, and loving hearts and hands will toil for them, so that they shall enter on a period of blessed possibilities and development, through the fostering Americans care of the missionaries. The love of those who, so to speak, adopt them, will tell for good on the next generation of India.

But, the world over, the treatment of its poor and orphaned children by the State leaves much to be desired. Australia, which in some respects sets a pattern in reformatory movements, is far in advance here of America, and can give us points worth study. A hundred years hence there may be radical improvements here.

When we reach delinquent children we are faced by almost insoluble problems. Our present method is to send a big policeman with a club after a diminutive offender, to clap the midget very safely behind bars, and to give him for company the worst older boys and most depraved men we can find. With childhood's natural habit of looking up to the next older person in sight, the unfortunate child looks up to the thief, the drunkard, the burglar, and determines to copy him, or copies him without effort.

A child of the streets, early motherless, was hit on the head with a brick at the age of five, and tossed thereafter from hand to hand, like a ball. Probably he was a little cigarette fiend, and familiar with all evil within his reach. He was sent to the House of Refuge. It apparently failed to develop his character in gentleness. Finally, in a moment of caprice, he killed his playmate with a knife thrust in the throat. There was no anger, or malice, nothing but an insane impulse, the impulse to homicide, but a commission of expert doctors declared the child sane and responsible. I think he had, if you choose, possession of the devil. There is a bare possibility that the murder may have been an accident, a slip of a sharp knife in a heedless hand. When arraigned, the child did not show penitence or seem impressed with his awful situation. Not knowing what else to do with him, as he was too young to be, according to our highly civilized system, electrocuted, the judge, heart-broken at his own predicament in the matter, sent the little criminal to Sing Sing for twenty years. What will Sing Sing do to reform this child? Everything which can destroy any feeble germ of self-respect, any possibility of awakening dormant good or of making the boy a worthy citizen, Sing Sing will certainly do. As a great crushing machine, prison life and discipline, prison contact and routine will efface the best in the boy, and inevitably foster the worst. His little victim was the more fortunate of the two lads by far.

Some intelligent scheme for the up-building of character in child criminals should engage the attention of philanthropists. The George Junior Republic, the Burnham Farm, and similar enterprises are flashlights on what may be done when brains, and love, and devotion attempt the task. But, as we mothers tuck our babies in at night, let us pray for the lost lambs outside the fold. And let no mother grieve too bitterly, not knowing what may happen in days to come to any child, if, of her darling, she must say,

And that is best.

Catch-All

—MILICENT. The bride writes a note of thanks to each friend who sends her a gift.

—DOMESTIC. In New England, maids are engaged and paid weekly. In New York, by the month.

—POLLY D. Better pay as you go. The credit system is convenient, but proves too great a temptation for most people.

—MOTHER. I would not sit up for my boy every night, but if awake when he comes in, I would call to him and say something pleasant.

—IN THE SERE LEAF. An old lady cannot be too careful to dress daintily and becomingly, but she must avoid a too youthful style.

—LEWIS. On no account touch a lady's arm when you are walking with her, unless to save her from a runaway horse or an automobile.

—CHARLES. You are loving yourself better than your fiancée, when you insist on her giving up all her old friends and devoting her entire attention to you.

—MUSA. Every sensible girl avoids even the appearance of flirtation. She makes no advances toward a man's acquaintanceship. Like Sentimental Tommy, if he wishes to know her he will find a way. I fancy you are too young to care about admirers. Wait until you are out of school, my dear.

—A LITTLE COUNTRY GIRL. In using a tea or a soup spoon, dip with the side of the spoon away from, not towards you. And take either coffee or soup from the side of the spoon. Never tip the soup plate. Never leave your teaspoon in your cup. To dip bread in one's coffee is shocking; I cannot imagine anyone as doing it. Also to eat with open mouth or with noise shows an education neglected in childhood.

God Bless Us All!

As we enter another year, let us do so in conscious dependence on our Father in Heaven, in conscious resting on him for daily help. Day by day, night by night, let us commit to him our every care, knowing that He careth for us. And so, God bless us all in the new year.

The Newsboy

Preternaturally acute, the newsboy is a street type which repays interest. Ready with a retort, courteous or otherwise, fiercely fighting for his rights, with a certain esprit de corps, too, which makes him stand up for his class, quick to seize an advantage, sometimes very honorable always a bright little man of business, the newsboy of New York may become

SQUIRRELS, when not frightened by rudeness or hostility, are exceedingly companionable, and make friends with visitors to their haunts or with people residing near them, just as kittens do, even learning to rest on a man's shoulder, or sleep in his coat pocket. Whoever would win a squirrel's confidence must have great patience, must let Bunny make the advances, and must win him by presents of nuts as well as by kind looks and quiet caresses.

No squirrel, however, should be caught by a boy and shut up in a cage. A squirrel's nature is opposed to captivity and he cannot enjoy himself unless he has a wide domain, trees to climb, places to hide his store of winter's food, for he is very thrifty, and his own share of earth, air and sky, without bars and fences. A squirrel on a revolving wheel is a very pitiful sight. If a boy wants to pet a squirrel, let him emulate Uncle Roderick, who stops in his daily ramble in the park to cultivate acquaintance with Nature's children in fur and feathers, and who always carries some toothsome surprise to please his little friends.

A Musical Fire-Alarm

Foreman James E. B. Powers, tired from a long day's work, was sound asleep in his cottage, corner of Quarry Road and One Hundred and Eighty-first street, New York. Upstairs his wife and baby were slumbering, too. People, not invalids, are usually in profound sleep at three o'clock in the morning, and there was absolute stillness in the cottage and around it. Suddenly the silence was broken in James Powers' room by floods of melody proceeding from two gilded cages. He heard it in his sleep, but did not stir. The canaries sang on as if their throats would burst! They called to mind every note they could think of. Why would not their master stir! Why did not the queer smell, the strange, red glare wake him! "Those birds are a nuisance!" he thought in his sleep; then, more fully conscious: "What's the matter with them?" He opened his eyes to look at the cage. Then he sprang to his feet—the house was in flames! He ran upstairs and hurried his wife and babies to a place of safety. The pretty golden singers, who had given the timely warning in the only language they knew, were rescued, too. Perhaps this is the first case on record where Mr. Powers' songsters deserve a medal.

The Mother-Element

If, by some means, woman's intuition, tact, and strong common sense, could be added to the wisdom of man, when childish crimes and misdemeanors, and the offences of women are matters of judgment, there would be a gain. The mother-element is needed when baffling cases of juvenile wickedness are under review. The genius of Victor Hugo in the redemption of Jean Valjean, has shown us the practicabilities of restoration in the confirmed criminal. God forbid that we ever despair of childhood. A council of women, to be called when necessary, would be a step toward right jurisprudence.

THE PERFECT GIFT

My little daughter brought nine days ago, A card pricked thus: "Mamma, I love you so," "I had no money to buy gifts for you," She whispered, "Mamma, can you make this do?"

"Sweetheart," I said, "there is no need to sigh, The best gifts are the things we cannot buy. Our dear Lord had no money, yet he gave That which the hungry world doth ever crave, Ungrudging love and service. Without these No gift is perfect. With them aught will please."

Feeding 8,000 Poor at the Bowery Mission.

THE last week of the nineteenth century, will be a red-letter one in the memory of many thousands of New York's deserving poor, whose Christian friends took extraordinary pains to make them happy on that blessed anniversary. The Salvation Army gave its great dinner in Madison Square Garden; Municipal Lodging Houses were hospitable to the needy; and every church and mission in the city strove to its utmost to seek out the desolate and make them glad.

The Bowery Mission exceeded its past record in rendering timely service to the destitute. The breakfast and dinner for homeless men, the Christmas tree, radiant with lights and burdened with pretty and useful gifts are traditions, and every reader of the paper is familiar with the story of these delights, which are annually repeated for the joy of old and young. Early Christmas morning, 1900, the Bowery was blocked to Chatham Square with hungry men, waiting for the doors to open and admit them to the morning meal; at night, another throng filled their places.

At two o'clock the merry company that filled the hall was composed of little people —"some in rags, some in tags"—and none in "velvet gowns," though many there were whose neatly patched and laundered garments showed a poor mother's thrifty care to enable her darlings to look as neat as might be for the happy festival. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, living in many States, helped to hang that beautiful tree with gifts. Of course "Mother Bird" was there, as happy as the little folks to whose lives she adds so much of joy and gladness. Twelve hundred small maids received gifts from her kindly hands, and with each gift a pleasant word and smile. Through distribution of dinners by wagon, good cheer was carried from one end of the town to the other, across to Brooklyn, and into hundreds of homes whose inmates would otherwise have gone hungry Christmas day. The Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had made most liberal provision that all cases of need reported should be met, and at the Mission wagons and workers were on duty from dawn to midnight. An avalanche of applications that came in later than the time appointed were filled as far as possible, and neither money, love nor labor spared in the effort that nobody might go to bed Christmas day without a reminder that some one had thought of them. Through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Christmas Fund nearly ten thousand hungry people were fed in one day. All possible pains had been taken to select only the neediest, worthiest poor, and in this task THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was gladly assisted by pastors of churches and missions, by deaconesses and other workers among the destitute.

The old Mission was a busy scene for some time before the holidays. On Christmas eve and for two nights before nobody seemed to sleep. Mrs. Aery, Mother Bird's right hand, was receiving presents for the Christmas tree. Mr. Eagleston, President of the Bowery Boys' Club, was devising pleasant things for his boys, and hinting delicately to everybody that "clothes, or money to buy clothes with, would be most acceptable gifts for them," adding persuasively, "I can get employment for a number of them if I can make them presentable." Carpenters were sawing and hammering away, setting up tables on which to dispose the bountiful feast. a corps of clerks were going over lists and transferring names to tags that were to be attached to bundles and baskets of good things. Mr. Cord, the chef presiding over the mighty range in the big kitchen, kept a large force and wife;" a laborer with a sick wife and little children crying around him; a home where a delicate girl of sixteen tries to support a family with her slender earnings; another where "the father has been dead some time, mother died a week ago, where there is a half-witted grandmother, several little children, and a lad of seventeen supplying their needs as best he can;" homes where the crippled, the halt, the deaf and dumb and blind are seeking to make a living in spite of handicaps; homes where the sick lie on lingering beds; basements where consumptives are coughing their lives away; were all on the route of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S messengers of mercy. The following cases are selected, typical of hundreds visited:

of helpers occupied in basting hundreds of toothsome turkeys and chickens, peeling mountains of potatoes, and performing other offices of preparation. Christmas Eve everybody worked all night, putting up bundles and baskets and tagging them with names and addresses and a pretty card of greeting. Some bundles were small. Referring to the list from which recipients' names were taken, one read: "An aged man, very poor, living alone." "A poor old woman who has no friends." "A working-girl who has lost her position through illness." "A stranger in the city, out of work," or some such simple but eloquent line of description. Other bundles were so large the bearer staggered beneath their weight. The writer delivered one to a family of eleven. The recipient of one basket, an Italian, knowing no English, dropped on her knees and burst into tears. Several distributors reported similar cases where mothers in bare rooms, with hungry children around them, could only express their gratitude by weeping. One distributor had on his list eleven aged "widows all alone, and all Christian women," living on top floors of tall tenements, or in dark basements. Deserted wives trying to care for worse than fatherless little ones; a wife and mother, whose husband is in Sing Sing; "an old man tiny children. Little ones delighted; had feared they would have no Christmas dinner. K. Three old ladies, ages ranging from seventy-five to fifty-five, and an aged man. Food had not passed their lips for three days, they said, and they looked as if it had not. They could hardly speak, and their gratitude was expressed in tears. Mrs. M., Cannon street. Widow, with five little children; her room bare of comfort, no cheer, no food, no sprig of green. Miss P., Goerick street. A lady of sixty, who is supporting her widowed and bedridden sister, aged seventy-seven, the latter being stone-deaf and blind in one eye. Mrs. B., Twelfth street. Almost totally blind and deaf, supporting two young boys. Mrs. L., Avenue A. Widow, very ill; six in family; looked after by daughter, aged sixteen. Mrs. Z., Fifth street. Husband sick ever since April, 1890, when he swept snow through the great storm. Three little boys. Everything very clean, very bare. Mr. Z. looks as if in last stages of consumption. Mrs. C., West Nineteenth street. Washerwoman. Husband bedridden; ill for long time. Mrs. C.'s strength almost exhausted. Mrs. D., Minetta Place. A worthy and needy woman with three young children and an aged grandmother (ninety-two years old) to care for.

GOOD CHEER FOR THE WORTHY POOR

The twenty or thirty Bowery Mission men who, under their tireless, devoted leader, Superintendent Hallimond, performed all the work of preparation and assisted in distribution, were the Mission's own saved sons. It was to them a laborious but a beautiful week of service.

The very merriest function of the season was the boys' dinner, when 200 lads—boot-blacks, newsboys, errand boys and boys with no jobs at all—sat around two long tables in the Mission Hall and feasted royally on turkey, celery, potatoes and pie, and then rose up to receive presents from the Christmas tree. Four hundred red stockings were festooned over the platform, and every boy received a pair of stockings filled with good things and a CHRISTIAN HERALD premium calendar. The boys cheered every body and everything. Several members of the club stood on benches and delivered original literary productions, which were fearfully and wonderfully made; they were unstintingly applauded, some rather frank but good humored criticisms mingling with the cheers.

Whenever President Eagleston's head appeared around the corner of the Christmas tree they broke into raptures. Every time Mrs. Bird opened her mouth they went wild. When Mrs. Hallimond sang Professor Benke's Christmas carol for them they encored her to the echo. Whenever Mr. Hallimond stood up toothsome morsels were interrupted on their journey to hungry mouths, while two hundred voices yelled and four hundred hands clapped approval. When Dr. Klopsch, his wife and son appeared the boys almost took the roof off the house. They expressed a perfectly deafening appreciation of his address, after listening to it with an intelligent and earnest attention which seemed to take its lessons to heart, and which would have done credit to an older and more cultivated audience.

Poor little men! brave little men! many of them will date the inspiration of their lives from that beautiful night in the Bowery Mission, where they sat with evidences all around of the loving interest which Christian people feel in their life struggle. These boys need such inspiration. Some of them are helping to support little brothers and sisters; others to help a hard-working mother; others to get along as best they can in a wretched, rum-cursed home; some have no home at all. One lad at that table, a few weeks ago, had walked two and a half days without food, looking for work. He drifted into the Mission and work was found for him. The Bowery Mission will do its utmost to make the new year one of blessing to all these boys of the Bowery.

HOW HE FOUND CHRIST

How the Rev. Robt. McIntyre, Pastor and Platform Orator, Came to be a Christian

ROBERT MCINTYRE was born in Scotland. His parents were strict believers in the tenets of the Presbyterian faith. His mother died when he was between seven and eight years of age. Dr. McIntyre later discovered in a letter written by his father to her relatives, her sublime trust and faith in God to guide and guard her children. From Philadelphia, where his mother died, they removed to a small village. When eighteen years old, the father died, making Robert the head of a little family of three children by a second wife, besides himself.

By this time the boy had grown to be very morose and bitter in his heart toward religion. He felt that it was wrong when his mother was taken away from him, and when his father died his heart was filled for the first time. The preacher literally shook his soul, and he saw his sinful nature so clearly that he longed for peace with God. He was stiff-necked, however, and refused to go to the altar, but tremblingly asked an interview with the preacher on the next day. They talked two hours to no purpose, save that the preacher's influence on him waned. Seeing this, Dr. Bushong asked the privilege of praying with him. They were alone in the church. They knelt together, but the Holy Ghost came into that quiet room. McIntyre was broken, and went home deeply moved by the prayer.

That night he went back to hear Dr. Bushong preach again. Again he felt that the sermon was for him. As the discourse proceeded, he was shaking like a leaf, and was afraid his friend would see his agitation. He thought: "Oh, if I could only get out into that cold and wintry street, I would never again attend such a meeting." He thought it was not for him—the infidel, the unbeliever—to be saved. When the invitation was given for those who would seek Christ to go to the altar, his friend said: "Go! go! go to the altar!" "No! never! never!" he replied. Dr. Bushong was greatly disappointed. He began the benediction. In the middle he stopped, and a great wave of feeling came over young McIntyre. He ran as fast as he could to the altar, and fell, not kneeling, but prone upon the floor. All his pride was gone. His one thought now, his one cry, was for salvation. Those fifty good Christian people in that cold, little basement, stood about him singing: "Come to Jesus, just now, just now!" The cry of the broken man's heart was "Oh, God, for Jesus' sake save me!" Not knowing in his spiritual ignorance the simplicity of the great renunciation, he struggled in agony for an hour; by the simple teaching of an aged lady, who bowed beside him, he saw the Cross at last and embraced it. A mountain of sin seemed to slip from his shoulders and he wept from exceeding joy. He said to himself: "Is this the joy Christians speak of?" The people who stood about him said: "Speak!" and he spoke for about three minutes.

In a few days, something seemed to whisper to him that God wanted him to be a minister. He could not go to sleep with the question unsettled. It was after midnight. He went out on the street, and it was in the dead of winter. He walked several squares. At the corner of Seventh and Chestnut streets, St. Louis, there stood the public library, with large buttresses extending into the sidewalk. He said to himself: "Here is your altar." And he turned into one of these recesses and knelt upon the cold, frosty pavement. He prayed: "Oh, Lord, if there be anything in me that is useful in thy service, it is thine. Take me and use me anywhere." He arose very happy. He felt that he was then a Christian minister and that heaven had ordained him.

REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

HOW can we commence a new period of time more appropriately than by prayer? Our times are in the hand of God. With him rests all the future. We have need to thank him for the mercies and blessings of the past, and to beseech his help and loving care in the time to come. That fact is so fully recognized that the Evangelical Alliance, representing all denominations of Christians, suggested, many years ago, a period of prayer covering eight days, commencing with the first Sunday of the year. The Alliance also suggested topics for each day of the week, in order that in all Christian lands supplications for the same blessing might go up simultaneously to the Throne of Grace. Christ promised his disciples that if any two of them agreed on earth as touching anything that they should ask, it should be done for them (Matt. 18: 19). That promise gave direct encouragement for such a united movement as the Alliance suggested, and so the observance has become general throughout Christendom. The topics for this year were published in this journal last week, and they were seen to be so general that all Christians could unite in them, yet so definite that they touch every department of family, social and church life.

In all our cities there has been an increasing observance of this annual celebration. Many churches have held special prayer-meetings for their own members, besides the central meeting-place chosen for united prayer. In New York, this year, the Marble Collegiate Church was selected for this latter purpose, and our picture on the first page of this issue represents the scene at its doors during the week. It is a significant scene, indicating the universality of need and the consciousness that in God alone can that need be supplied. In spite of all that scoffers and sceptics have been able to do, there is a profound conviction in the human heart, practically visible this week throughout the world, that God does hear and answer prayer. There are some now, as there were in the days of the patriarch, who ask, "What profit should we have if we pray unto him?" But in every generation there have been many who out of their own experience could testify that "God is the rewarder of those who diligently seek him." Such men have no need of argument; they do not need to have the theory of prayer explained to them—they know. In many an hour of perplexity and distress, and sorrow and bereavement, they have bent the knee before God and have received answers of peace. Not that all their prayers have been answered, but they have learned that God has shown his love to them sometimes by not granting their petitions, and so they go to him in confidence, trusting both in his wisdom and in his love. Science has done much for the world; and education is increasing our knowledge and power, but there are needs in our nature that neither can satisfy; so with devout reverence and in full assurance of faith as we begin a new year and this year a new century, we place ourselves with all our manifold needs in the hands of our Father who is in heaven.

A Modern Mordecai

The story of Mordecai and Esther is recalled by the manner in which Nicholas II. will show his appreciation of the services of his physician, Dr. Hirsch, an orthodox Jew, who has been in the imperial household since the time of Alexander III., to whose skill and faithfulness the Czar's recovery from his recent illness is attributed. The Czarina, her heart full of gratitude and joy, asked the beloved physician what form the imperial recognition should take. Like Mordecai, Dr. Hirsch asked nothing for himself, but plead for repeal of certain oppressive measures against his co-religionists, adding that this would not only mean more to him than any personal honor or distinction that the crown could bestow, but that the world would recognize it as a worthy thank-offering to God on the part of their majesties. He urged, too, that such a measure would add to her husband's fame as an enlightened, humane and liberal-minded ruler, besides contributing in no small measure to the economic improvement of the empire. All these were reasons appealing to the sympathy and judgment of this modern Esther, who has stood so wisely and nobly by her husband in the many great reforms that he has undertaken. The result is that an imperial ukase putting the Jews of Russia, numbering some 5,000,000, on the same civic and political footing with their fellow-subjects, is soon to be issued by Nicholas II., who, with every year of his life, enlarges his right to the title of the "White Czar." The Official Messenger has formally announced that the Czar, moved by the sympathy and anxiety displayed among all classes of his subjects during his illness, commanded his heartfelt gratitude to be made known throughout the Empire.

A Gift to the Tombs Prisoners

Chaplain Munro, of the Tombs Prison, New York, was the recipient of a Christmas gift which afforded him the liveliest satisfaction. It was a package containing over three hundred Red Letter New Testaments, which the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had forwarded with his compliments, to be distributed among the prisoners—one for each inmate of the prison—as a Christmas gift.

REV. ROBERT MCINTYRE

with bitterness. He said to himself, "If there is a God, he is cruel." He began to read sceptical books and to frequent the presence of those who sneered and scoffed at Christianity.

One winter his brother attended revival meetings and was converted. He assumed an active part in the services, peculiarly so, for one so young. Some mischief-making people told Robert that his brother was becoming crazed with religion, and that it was his duty to save him from the madhouse and get him away from those fanatics. Full of anger, Robert marched to the church and demanded of the leaders of the meeting that they cease calling on his brother for prayers and song. His pleadings and threats were of no avail. His brother still went to the meetings, and one night Robert dragged him into a room by sheer force and locked him there. The next night, the young fellow eluded him by going straight to the meeting from his work. That night, when he came home, the elder brother told him he owed him the duty of a father to a rebellious son, and soundly thrashed him. He earnestly believed he was doing what was right. In the middle of the night, however, he heard his brother creep quietly out of bed and shut himself in a large closet and soon after learned he was praying for him. This broke Robert's heart. He made up his mind not to interfere with any one who would pray for him under circumstances like those. Still, he did not give his own heart to Christ.

Time passed on, and young McIntyre, now an unbeliever, and an active foe of the Church, and calling himself "a moral deist," promised a young man of his acquaintance to candidly listen to revival services for one week. So one evening in February, 1877, he entered First Church, M. E. South, St. Louis. It was a snowy night and only a mere handful of people were present. He had gone expecting to hear Dr. Finney, the pastor, but in his place Dr. Bushong, pastor of Central M. E. Church, St. Louis, preached. Almost from the beginning, the Holy Spirit made a special message to Robert McIntyre. He was stricken through the conscience

THE NEW PARSON*

YES, parson, you've studied in books, no doubt,

But when the heart is a-longin' to pray,
We don't consider what's best to say;
There's a feelin' behind just a-crowdin' it out.

Your preachin' has got us somehow unstrung;
An' just when our feelin's beginnin' to wake,

Some furrin lingo creeps in t' break
The spell; we feel in our mother tongue.

We ain't a-hungerin' for Latin and Greek,
What we want, parson, is reason an' truth,
The good old kind that we larned in youth;
An' a simple language we all can speak.

Your intentions is good, but your high-flown terms

An' logic—no doubt o' the very best—
Don't seem to lull us to peaceful rest,
We listen and feel we are ignorant worms.

The trout swims deep when the fishhawk calls;
The thrush is oftener found in the thorn;
The scarecrow's better'n a rose in the corn;
An' the rainbow shines where the water falls.

A star is brighter seen through the trees,
An' God is nearer in storm than sun;

It tenders the heart an' it softens the tone
To feel that he with his own agrees;

That back of all trouble a glorious power Still leaves an' blossoms the bleak, bare grove;

The vine climbs higher'n the tree for His love;

The same as we mortals in tryin' hour.

An' so believin' you can't think strange
If we plod along in our simple way
The little time that we have to stay,
An' don't go huntin' about for change.

Now, don't be angered at what I've said.

Go right on, parson, an' pray an' preach
In a natural way an' a natural speech,
An' let the dead languages rest with the dead.

The President's Cabinet†

WASHINGTON began his administration by observing the practice, apparently marked out in the Constitution, of calling upon the heads of departments for written opinions, but he not infrequently called them together for consultation. The same practice was observed under John Adams; but in Jefferson's time the cabinet assumed more the definite shape now given to it. There is no obligation resting upon the President under the laws of Congress, as we have seen there is none under the Constitution, to consult or be governed by the opinions of his department chiefs. For instance, the act creating the Department of Foreign Affairs (State) provides in express terms that the secretary "shall conduct the business of the department in such manner as the President of the United States shall from time to time order or instruct." It is stated, upon the authority of one of its members, that Mr. Jefferson did not ask the advice of his Cabinet in the most important event of his administration—the purchase of Louisiana; Mr. Lincoln made the final decision respecting his proclamation of emancipation without consulting his Cabinet; and Mr. McKinley is understood to have resolved upon the annexation of Hawaii contrary to the views of his Secretary of State.

Although the head of the State Department in a certain sense the mere clerk of the President, it has been asserted that his position is of such importance that he is one of six men, who, through constitutional forms, constitute a nearly irresponsible despotism, the other five being the Few men are better qualified to write a review of the foreign affairs of the United States during the last one hundred years than John W. Foster. President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Speaker of the House, and the chairmen of the two important committees of the two houses of Congress. This is an exaggerated figure of speech, but there is no doubt the Secretary of State occupies a position whereby, through his own hasty or intemperate action, or that of his agents abroad, he could involve the country in complications which might seriously jeopardize its interests or its honor, or even embroil it in war. Fortunately, the care with which the office has been filled has not exposed the country to any such peril. Washington called to the place as first secretary, Thomas Jefferson, who stood in the first rank of our revolutionary statesmen. For three successive terms the Secretary of State succeeded to the Presidency. John Quincy Adams and Lincoln appointed their party rivals to the post. The selection of his Secretary of State is the first duty of every newly elected President, and is made with more care than that of any other officer. Six Secretaries of State have been elected President, and in the list appear, besides, the illustrious names of John Marshall, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, William L. Marcy, Lewis Cass, William H. Seward and James G. Blaine.

A Poetical Bouquet

Flowers of Thought, collected by Cecilia M. Tibbitts. As the compiler suggests, on the title page, she has gathered a posy of other poets' flowers, and nothing but the thread that binds them her own. She has certainly gathered here many beautiful thoughts from the poets. Skimming through the pages we find bits from Emerson, Holmes, Edwin Arnold, Adelaide Proctor, Tennyson, Whittier, Canon Wilberforce, Jean Ingelow and Browning. There are thoughts for all moods, all occasions—for cheerfulness, friendship, childhood, God's care, prayer, divine service, the new year. Margaret E. Sangster, in a foreword, says:

Many a busy woman, cumbered with the cares incidental to homemaking and housekeeping, finds that she has little time for reading books, but she can now and then, in a leisure moment, solace herself with some sweet flower of thought. Culled from fields far and near, by a loving and judicious hand, these blooms are from the trees and plants which never fade, being watered from that River of Life which evermore flows round about the throne. They will afford balm and heartease to every reader, and in the between times they will be means of profit and pleasure. A gracious office is performed by compilations of this order. Their mission is one of encouragement, of help and of comfort.

Saving Chinese Babies*

A PAIR of English travelers persuaded Edward and his party to go with them to the Great Wall. Just outside a little town a man was overtaken, with two baskets hung by cords from a yoke over his shoulders. Thinking they might contain oranges, the merchant, Mr. Bright, hailed him. He did not seem disposed to attend, but sulkily went on his way, and suddenly a cry proceeded from one of the baskets. "Kittens to be drowned," said the merchant to his wife, evidently wishing to believe so; but, "No, no, it is a baby, a poor baby!" exclaimed Aline. "Stop him, Edward, stop him."

Edward was meantime parleying in Chinese with the bearer, who, as usual, was perfectly civil and impassive, and no doubt seeing the way to profit, made known that he was employed to carry four little girl infants to be disposed of in the streams that watered the paddy-field in the valley. The stranger Sing-Sang might have them if he liked for a certain sum. The baskets were opened in spite of the protestations of Mr. Bright, and two of the poor little white things proved to be quite dead. Another was feebly moving, evidently at the last gasp; but the one whose cries had been heard looked stronger, and as if her life might be saved. Each little creature might be had for the price of five pence. This Edward paid, while his two friends wondered at his thinking it worth while to purchase the dying child; but he kept it in his own arms, with his handkerchief over it, and gave the other to Mabel, who, happily, had a gourd of milk procured at the inn. They were not far from a mountain stream, which descended into the rice-field below, and there spread out into a marsh. Here Edward called a halt, and taking off his hat, knelt and baptized the infant he had carried, by the name of Mary. There was just enough quivering motion about her to show that she was still alive.

*From The Making of a Missionary, a story of mission work in China, by Charlotte M. Yonge. This tale was written before the Boxer troubles began, and tells of the sudden raids of fanatics, such as the Vegetarians, who fell on the Steward family and their helpers at Kucheng. Pp. 228, illustrated. Price, $1. Published by Thomas Whitaker, New York.

"That was worth the price," he said to his companions, as he mounted again, having laid the newly baptized Mary, now evidently dead, in his wife's lap. There was a small Christian station at the next halt for the night, where a tiny grave was hollowed out beneath a wide-spreading tree, and there the innocent one was left, while her sister in desertion and adoption rested all unconscious on Mabel's bosom.

An Old Indian Village. By John August Udden. Professor Udden, while instructor in Bethany College, at Lindsborg, Kansas, discovered near Lindsborg traces of an ancient Indian village. As the result of explorations on the part of himself and associates, an interesting collection of relics, now the property of Bethany College, was obtained. One of these relics is a piece of chain-mail of undoubted European origin, which is of peculiar interest as showing the early presence in the interior of European explorers. Professor Udden's description of the collection is accompanied by good cuts of articles mentioned. The pamphlet is an interesting addition to Americana dealing with aboriginal life. It is published by authority of the Directors of Augustana College and Theological Seminary, Rock Island, Ill.

WISE LANDLADY.

Understands How to Increase Her Business.

The landlady of a certain restaurant in Brockton, Mass., has increased her business so rapidly that she has had to enlarge her dining room to accommodate the continually increasing patronage. One of her guests gives the reason.

"Every morning she serves her regular guests with Grape-Nuts and hot milk or hot cream in cold weather, and cold cream in summer. I began eating this food and right away began to feel an improvement in my health. I had been terribly troubled with nervousness and dyspepsia and found it impossible to find a food that would agree with me, until I began boarding at this restaurant.

"The new food, in four months, increased my weight from 120 pounds to 145 and I never felt as well in my life as I do now. There is something remarkable in the sustaining power of this food. I have never been able to obtain such results from any other." G. R. Hersey, 30 L Street, Brockton, Mass.

HELP IN EMERGENCY

A Benevolence which Aids the Worthy People in Distress...

ONE of the most prominent difficulties in the work of charity is that of giving relief without pauperizing the recipient. There is always a danger that people who prefer to live on charity and avoid work, will get the help that kind-hearted people are willing to give, while the self-respecting man who needs aid in an emergency, but wants to keep his independence and earn his own living, cannot get the assistance he needs. There are times of sickness, times when the bread-winner cannot get employment, times of accidental calamity, when a fire or some other misfortune strips a man of all he has. He needs temporary help to carry him over a few weeks until the tide turns and he is able to earn money again. In such cases he does not want a gift which would destroy his self-respect; he needs a loan which he can repay when he is able. It is such need that the Provident Loan Society has been organized to meet. Heretofore in an emergency of this kind the only resource is the pawnbroker, or one of the loan societies, which charge a high rate of interest. Even the pawnbroker charges at the rate of thirty per cent. a year. Thus the misfortune which has made borrowing a necessity is intensified by the penalty that borrowing involves.

Taking these facts into account, some well-known friends of the poor in New York, such as Dr. Greer, of St. Bartholomew's Church, Hon. Seth Low, Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, Mr. August Belmont and Miss Grace Dodge, united in an effort to provide a means of helping the honest families in an emergency on less onerous terms by organizing the Provident Loan Society. The Society adopts the principle of the pawnbroker in requiring the deposit of personal property as security for a loan, but instead of the pawnbroker's rate of three per cent. a month for the first half year, and two per cent. for the second half year, it charged one per cent. a month, and has recently reduced its charge to ten per cent. a year. This, as will be seen, is one-third the pawnbroker's rate, and is an important advantage in the time of difficulty, when every cent saved is worth considering. The effort has been heartily appreciated by the people whom it was designed to help. In addition to the headquarters at 279 Fourth Avenue, a branch office has been opened in the University Settlement Society's building, and now another has been established in West Forty-second street, and still another in Harlem. All these are doing excellent work, and are growing in popular favor.

Last year no less than fifty-eight thousand persons availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Society. The total amount advanced to them during that period was one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Such figures show not only the benefit conferred by the Society, but the appalling need there was for such an enterprise. Since the organization of the Society, the amount advanced has been four million dollars. It speaks well for the borrowers and sheds a light on their honesty and integrity, that the failures to repay loan and interest at the time agreed upon were not more than one and a third per cent.

There are few cities in our land where such an enterprise could not be established. Everywhere there are men of wealth who would be willing to furnish capital for the purpose. Their money would be safe, and would yield a good return on the investment. On the other hand, the beneficiaries would obtain just the kind of help they need without being degraded by the receipt of charity. The awful struggle some of them have to make when misfortune comes to them deserves our heartfelt sympathy. Such a system as this is a practical mode of showing that sympathy while it entails no burden on the benefactors. It is in the hope that such enterprises may be organized in other cities for the benefit of our brethren "who are ready to perish," that we tell this story of what has been done in New York.

THE CENTURY'S GREATEST TASK

WHAT is the Most Important Task of the Twentieth Century? The New York Journal sent this question to some of the foremost thinkers and doers of many nations, the answers being copyrighted by Mr. W. R. Hearst. South Africa is represented by Paul Kruger, who says: "I hope the century will witness the universal adoption of arbitration, for this is the only means of rightly settling quarrels between nations."

Sir Edmund Monson, the statistician, prays for the disappearance of class animosities and a recognition by the rich of their duties to the poor.

Art is represented by the noted painter, Carolus Duran. "I hope," he says, "to see humanity follow Christ's doctrine, 'Love one another'; to see wars end, and fraternity cease to be a vain word."

Other French names in the list are G. Clemenceau, the philosopher and journalist, who bids for the triumph of justice, the triumph of right over force and human imbecility. Camille Flammarion, the astronomer, writes: "The phonograph and telephone shall be surpassed by the conquests of the spectroscopic, that will place us in communication with Mars, a race far superior to ours, whose teaching shall be our regeneration."

Spanish womanhood has a champion in the Infanta Eulalie, whose desire is that the twentieth century shall see the independence of woman more generally asserted, that the next one hundred years will bring all women healthy self-reliance.

Germany is represented by Max Nordau, the great economist and physicist. "I wish," he writes, "to see realized the utter stupidity, criminality and uselessness of war."

Japan's ablest statesman, the Marquis Ito, says: "I hope to witness more effective practical steps toward placing international relations upon a basis in unison with the peaceful fulfillment of human destiny."

That very astute diplomat, Wu Ting-fang, the Chinese Minister in Washington, continues the cry for peace, thus: "If all the great powers on earth will carry out the peaceful principles recognized by the Hague convention and abide by the decision of an international tribunal, then there is hope for an era of 'Peace on earth and good-will toward men.'"

Among the Americans who contribute original ideas concerning mankind's work, is the Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus, chief of the Armour Institute in Chicago. "The law of love," he says, "as laid down by Christ is the law of life and progress. This fact should be realized in the new century. It can be done only by each one's choice of an unselfish life and devoted labor, to the end that the other man's worth shall be joyfully defended by each one."

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage says: "I would have no more gathering of alms for the poor, because the poor will all have been enriched; no hospital Sunday, because diseased bones will have been set and the wounds all healed and the incurable diseases overcome by a materia medica and a pharmacy and a dentistry that have conquered everything."

Samantha's Little Namesake

Many of our readers will appreciate this letter from a little namesake of Josiah Allen's wife: "Dear Editor: I have seen a number of letters in your paper referring to Aunt Samantha's story, which, like others, we think is her best. My brother Russell, older than I, has taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for three years and we think it a most excellent religious paper. But referring to the story now going on in your paper, written by the person for whom eleven years ago I was named, you may well think I am pleased to have had mother call me for Miss Holley or Josiah Allen's wife. My name is spelled with two R's instead of an R and an L." MARRETTA A. FEE.

Her Father in the Same Mind.

"I never thought for one moment that coffee was the cause of my worn-out feeling and dull headaches and energy all gone, until I began to notice that my bad feelings came on every morning after drinking coffee for breakfast, no matter how well I felt when I got up."

"I began to think the subject over and finally decided to try Postum Food Coffee in place of common coffee and see if it was coffee that had been hurting me. After making the change, I discovered, to my delight, that the headache and worn-out feeling did not come on after breakfast."

"After a very thorough trial I am fully convinced that coffee was the cause of my trouble, and that leaving it off and using Postum Food Coffee has restored me to health. My father, who has had very poor health for several years, quit coffee some time ago and began using Postum in place of it. It would surprise anyone to see how much he has improved."

"When I boil Postum twenty minutes and serve it immediately while it is hot, with good rich cream, I think it far exceeds any coffee."

"Please do not print my name."

This lady lives in Prairie City, Iowa. Her name can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., of Battle Creek, Mich.

A PASTOR WHO BUILT HIS OWN CHURCH

WITH his own hands, and at his own expense, the Rev. Henry M. Lengel, of Reading, Pa., has built a church, the pulpit of which he himself will occupy. The building stands on a lot owned by Mr. Lengel's son, who donated the land for the purpose. It is one story high, 20 x 35 feet in dimensions, has a brick and stone front, and is furnished with plain benches. The new church is for the use of an independent religious society organized by Mr. Lengel a few months ago, and known as "The Followers of Christ."

PASTOR H. M. LENGEL

THE CHURCH PASTOR LENGEL BUILT

"I built the church," Mr. Lengel explains, "because many people who are poor do not think they are welcome in the large and fashionable churches. They feel out of place. I have had that experience myself. In our church the lowest beggar will be welcome, and rags will not bar admission of any one. We worship God in a simple manner, using our best efforts to learn the truth. There will be no pew rents, and the poorest person, who is not able to contribute a penny to our collections, will be welcome."

"The Christian Herald" in the Navy

In a letter from a young American on board the United States cruiser Chicago, in Brazilian waters, after giving an interesting description of life on a naval vessel, the writer says: "I received THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and was surprised to find so much interesting reading matter in them. I find them so interesting that I wish you would send them whenever you can spare them. . . . I read through one of the HERALDS, and gave it to a marine, thinking he would look at the pictures and then throw it aside, but instead, he sat down and commenced reading it, and when he was through he asked me for the others. This morning I saw a fellow reading one of them up on the fore-castle. It was no longer in good condition, but its frayed edges showed that it had gone the rounds, and had been in a great many hands. It is a wonder that the societies that make a practice of sending out papers and magazines do not supply the enlisted men who are far out on a foreign station, where a foreign language is spoken, and where news and reading matter in general is as 'scarce as hens' teeth.' They could not find a more appreciative lot of men anywhere."

If any reader should feel inclined to adopt the suggestion of the writer of this letter he may address Mr. W. M. Haendiges, United States cruiser Chicago, care of Mr. B. F. Stevens, 4 Trafalgar Square, London, England.

Oorfa Orphans Help India

OORFA, TURKEY, Nov. 17, 1900.

Dear Christian Herald Friends:—Yours of Oct. 24, with draft for $250.00, as promised quarterly payment for orphans, I acknowledge with sincere thanks. By this post I arranged for $11.00 (£2 1-2 Turkish) to be sent you for India sufferers through our Constantinople treasurer. It is contributions from Y. P. S. C. E. increased by our orphans, who earned the sum given by going without meat one of the three times a week they ordinarily have it.

CORINNA SHATTUCK.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A LITTLE maid stood at her father's knee
And looked up steadily with tender grace,
And she forgot if e'er she had a plea,
So glad was she to see her father's face.

'Twas joy to say: "I love you, Father dear!"
To hear her father murmur back: "My child!"
In such communion she could know no fear,
Nor want, nor pain, no wonder that she smiled!

To talk with God is privilege so sweet
That saints forget oftentimes for gifts to plead,
And lay themselves a gift at Jesus' feet—
Then Christ himself doth take up all their need.

Yet may we ask of God what gifts we will,
Sure of love's giving as his child may be.
Yet, O our Father, grant the best gift still,
Communion that finds happiness in thee!

—M. L. A.

Mrs. J. C. C., Marion, Ind., writes:

I desire to testify to several direct answers to prayer. All things are possible with God, and he will answer prayer when we keep the "inner life" in direct communication with him.

Mrs. S., Goltansville, Va., writes:

The money, ($3.75) which I sent to help support a famine orphan came in answer to prayer, and I want to acknowledge God's goodness.

Mary A., Savannah, Tenn., writes:

I want to acknowledge how good my Heavenly Father has been to me. I was in trouble and asked him for a special blessing on myself and mother; he heard and granted my prayer.

Reader, Georgetown, Ky., writes:

In answer to prayer God has lifted a very dark cloud from my life; and eased my aching heart. I praise him night and day. His tender mercies know no bounds.

Mrs. J. J. W., Chicago, Ill., writes:

Being greatly helped by reading the answers to prayer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I want to offer my testimony to the goodness of God. For three months I have been praying for a wayward daughter who left home. O how I longed for her! God has lovingly heard and answered my prayer. She came home night before last. We are all rejoiced.

A Novel Way to Help India

Mrs. C. A. Auger, Toronto, Canada, writes of quite a novel and simple plan, which is being pursued north of the lakes, for the benefit of India orphans. She says:

A band of young ladies in Toronto are selling one cent book-marks, and the proceeds are to be applied to orphan work. It will take a long time to accomplish anything with one cent book-marks, you say. Listen: we propose to sell one million! That will give us thousands of dollars for the fatherless, motherless ones. A lady of Toronto, a warm friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has promised to give $500, the support of twenty-five orphans for one year, in honor of the boys and girls of the United States if they will sell or buy two million book-marks in six months. These book-marks are very pretty, having on them the star of India and a Scripture verse, in gilt letters. They are made in five colors. This $500 is over and above the proceeds from the book-marks, which of course are to go to India, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We think the children of the United States and Canada, working together in this way, can accomplish great things for the motherless, fatherless little ones.

Orders for book-marks from Sunday Schools, Christian Endeavor Societies, Helping Hands, and other organizations, as well as from individuals, with the cash for them, should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

ABIDING INFLUENCE

Imperishable Principles Which May Transform the World...

WE often speak of this as a changing world. Its physical conditions are changing continually. Science scoffs at our phrase "the eternal hills"; for it has learned that the process of disintegration and accretion is going on unceasingly. And we expedite change for our own purposes, severing two continents at Suez that were joined; and connecting at Constantinople, two continents that were separated. Social conditions are changing, too. Great leaders who seemed essential to the world's progress pass away and new men occupy their places. Combinations for special purposes are made, achieve their purpose or fail, and disappear. New social forces are at work and new influences are operating everywhere, so that if a man, who was perfectly familiar with the world of society in his day, were to revisit the world fifty years after his death, he would be an utter stranger, at a loss to understand the situation. Even religion changes, so that the sermons of half a century ago are now antiquated and pointless. We have grown out of all that and have no interest now in the questions which, to the clergy of a former generation, seemed so essential. Everything changes; but through all the change, there are some things which in new forms do persist. The Apostle Paul, from his spiritual elevation saw at least three things that did abide: Faith, Hope and Love.

Looking back over history, we see the Apostle's words confirmed by facts. The men whose names the world cherishes were men with those characteristics. The great millionaires, the ruthless conquerors are forgotten, and we think most of the men whose great souls were inspired with a sublime faith, the leaders who struggled manfully in a great cause, hoping against hope for its triumph, and the men who loved their race well enough to live and die for it. They enjoy true immortality in the reverence and affection of the people. The torch of truth and right has been passed from hand to hand through the generations, but we cannot forget the pioneers who carried it through the initial stages. Their influence abides, and still has power in the world, inspiring others to follow in their steps. There is an immense consolation in that fact. The men die, but the cause survives and gains momentum by their lives and deaths. "Be of good courage, Master Ridley," said Latimer, as the flames coiled around him: "we shall this day light such a candle in England as by God's grace shall never be put out." Such men may be childless, but they have spiritual descendants who take up the standard as it drops from their lifeless hands, and carry it forward to victory. Who can measure the influence of the Pilgrim Fathers in the Mayflower; of the men who followed Washington through hardship and disaster; of John Brown perishing in contumely on the scaffold? These men, and hundreds of noble leaders in both hemispheres are immortal; their influence abides.

Very few have the opportunity of filling places so conspicuous, but every one can do his work as to exert such influence in his smaller circle. Who can tell what emergencies the boys now in our schools may have to meet fifty years hence? The way they will act in them, whether they will meet them bravely and with self-sacrifice, or whether they will prove poltroons and traitors depends largely on the influences under which they are growing up. If they see their fathers and the men they are taught to reverence, making money their God; if they are encouraged to admire success, no matter how it is achieved; if their ideals are men with money and power but no principle—then God help this nation when the crisis comes! The father of a family, the mother among her daughters, the employer in his factory, the statesman in his cabinet, are all exerting an influence which will bear fruit in the next generation. The time will come when these boys and girls, grown to manhood and womanhood, will think of their young days and ask themselves how their parents would have acted in the emergency that confronts them. All will depend then on the kind of principles that have been instilled in their minds, the kind of influence that the past has had upon them. If the faith and hope and love that the Apostle saw abiding in a world where everything was changing, have been incorporated in their being, this world will be a brighter and happier and better world than we have ever known.

TENEMENT REFORM .. IN GREAT CITIES

THE Tenement House Commission has just issued the third special report, prepared by the secretary, Mr. Lawrence Veiller, upon the subject of Tenement House Conditions. This latest report deals with housing conditions in the twenty-seven largest American cities, taking up in detail the conditions in Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston, Baltimore, Cleveland, Buffalo, San Francisco, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, New Orleans, Detroit, Milwaukee, Washington, Jersey City, Louisville, Minneapolis, Providence, Kansas City, St. Paul, Rochester, Denver, Toledo, Columbus, Syracuse, Nashville and Hartford. Besides describing the conditions in each of these cities, the report contains the statement of the more important provisions of the tenement laws and building laws in each city, and also extracts from some of the more important laws, notably those of Philadelphia, Buffalo and Boston.

Appended to the report is a comparative table showing the leading provisions of the different tenement house laws in cities grouped side by side, so that one may see the comparison at a glance. It seems that none of the large American cities, excepting Boston, Cincinnati, Jersey City and Hartford, have a tenement-house problem, and in the greater majority of these cities the tenement-house, as known in New York, does not exist, the poor people and working people living generally in small one-story or two-story houses containing one, or at the most two families, while in many cities these houses are often owned by the workingmen themselves.

Chicago, with a population of 1,698,575, has practically no tenement-house problem, and the same thing is true of Philadelphia, with a population of over a million and a quarter, St. Louis, with a population of over half a million, Baltimore, with a population of over half a million, and Cleveland, Buffalo, San Francisco, Pittsburgh, New Orleans, Detroit, Milwaukee and Washington, each of which cities has a population of over a quarter of a million, have no tenement-house problem. There are, of course, in each of these cities certain bad housing conditions, which give some of them what might be termed a housing problem, but this is distinct from the tenement-house problem as known in New York and Boston.

THE BETTER WAY

TALK hope! The world is sad enough Without your uttered doubts and fears, A little word of hope let fall Will scatter help for future years.

Talk faith, and let all unbelief Before your faithfulness depart; The shining radiance of your trust May cheer a comrade's fainting heart.

Talk purity! We've heard enough Of woman's shame and man's disgrace; In every soul tho' thick sins crust, Of love divine we find a trace.

Talk charity! For you and I Have sins enough, and some to spare. Tho' others err, we cannot know How much they had to do and dare.

Talk love! For love it is, you know, Which makes the universe revolve. And many things that puzzle us This simple rule of love would solve.

Talk Christ! And tell his wondrous love For saint and sinner, friend and foe. His life taught mercy for us all In this dark vale of sin below.

You Can Play Them Without Learning

THE CHURCH CHOIR ZOBO BAND OF PATERSON, N. J.

This band was organized by the church choir and Organist, Mr. W. F. Miller, as a means of raising money for Church and Missionary purposes. It was a success from the start, and has even participated in Easter Sunday service. The band is very proficient, and is now taking outside engagements. They find it a pleasant, profitable variation from routine work. Many Church Choirs have these Zobo Bands, and find them of great value. As a means of earning money for church purposes, a "Zobo Concert" invariably draws full houses. Zobo Bands can play any piece of music in all parts by ear or by note as preferred.

READ WHAT PASTORS AND ORGANISTS SAY ABOUT OUR INSTRUMENTS

G. B. Richardson, Business Manager of the "Young People's Weekly," Elgin, Ill., writes: "The Zobo Instruments I purchased of you were first used at an entertainment given at my home to the 200 employees of the 'Young People's Weekly.' Although the Quartette had opportunity for but one rehearsal the effort met unbounded enthusiasm and was voted a great success. We are now considering the organization of a full orchestra for next winter's entertainment, and I write this to ask you to forward me a select list of 12 to 15 instruments."

Wm. J. Siemers, leader of the Beacon Light Zobo Band, Baltimore, Md., writes: "I send you to-day copy of a Baltimore paper, giving a very complimentary notice of the 'Zobo' Concert given last night by the Beacon Light Zobo Band, composed of members of the choir of the Scott Street United Brethren Church. The concert was a great success, both artistically and financially, and at the close we received an offer at good pay for another engagement. Every church should have a Zobo Band. It is the pleasantest and easiest way of raising money that I ever tried or heard of, because any one that can hum a tune can play on a Zobo."

Miss Hattie E. Kountz, of Springfield, S. Dak., organist, choir leader, says: "Zobo Instruments received, and are all right, and we want more of them."

Rev. James C. Mitchell, of North Easton, N. J., says: "I have just received the Zobo Cornet and I am delighted with it; will organize a band."

Wm. F. Miller, organist and director of church choir of Park Ave. Baptist Church of Paterson, N. J., says: "I find the Zobo Brass Band Instruments to be first-class, and just what we needed. We have a fourteen piece Zobo Band, and intend to enlarge it. We have had one Zobo Concert, and would say it was a complete success."

Mae Blance Winfield, instructor in music at Galloway Female College, of Searcy, Ark., says: "I am much pleased with the Zobo Band Instruments."

Had we space we could quote you thousands of such letters from renowned persons who have had our goods, but we believe we have quoted enough to satisfy any reasonable person that we are perfectly reliable and that our goods are as represented.

CAN BE PLAYED BY ANY ONE WHO CAN HUM A TUNE—NO LEARNING

We do away with that long tedious labor of practice. It is the most extraordinary musical instrument ever produced. An instrument capable of almost every modulation, its music may be softened to the cooing of a dove or the thrilling song of the nightingale. The Cornet is an elegant accompaniment to Organ, Piano or any string instrument, and affords unlimited pleasure to the individual; suited for all in and outdoor entertainments. These instruments open up new possibilities to the Vocalists, and develop the vocal cords.

WITH A FULL BAND A GRAND PIPE ORGAN EFFECT CAN BE OBTAINED Those that have no Zobo Church Choir Band. Sing into the mouthpiece—Zobo does the rest.

$1.00 SPECIAL OFFER To introduce the musical marvel of the age and to give you a chance to test our instruments and prove all our claims, we will send the Zobo Cornet, solid brass, highly polished and lacquered, 11 inches long, 5 1/2 inch bell, with full instructions how to play, and handsomely illustrated catalogue, transportation charges prepaid, for $1.00. We make this offer, believing that all interested will eventually organize a Zobo Band. This is a grand offer, and you should not miss it. We warrant each instrument just as represented or money refunded. Send money by registered letter, postoffice money order, or a bank draft payable to our order.

These Questions Will be Answered Feb. 13

1. Is it a genuine test of a young man's patriotism to ask him to volunteer for military service at a time when the country is not menaced by any serious danger?
2. How is the distinction to be made between the "false shepherd and the true" in modern church life? What is the test to apply in such a case, where both men may be equally talented?
3. What are the chief races of the world, and why are we placed among the Aryans?
4. What are the Christian, Jewish, Roman and Mohammedan eras, and what events do they commemorate?
5. Are men by nature children of God, as Paul said (Acts 17: 28)? Or do they have to experience a change to become such as John says (John 1: 12)?

Questions of the Week

1. Does the popular religion of the day tend to the development of the highest type of Christian character?

No. Genuine religion has always, and will always be with the mass of people, unpopular. It was after Jesus preached the Sermon on the Mount that his Gospel became unpopular. It was when Luther proclaimed a heart-cleansing instead of a hand-washing Gospel, that storms lashed around him. There are men to-day who are snubbed because they preach and practice the doctrine and fact of Christian self-denial. The majority of human hearts rebel against religion, because in it there is a cross. Cover that cross with flowers, turn it into a huge bouquet, and the world will carry it on its shoulder proudly. Such a cross may become popular, but because it is so unlike the great Victim's cross, it will never produce the highest type of Christian character, which is the embodiment of self-sacrifice. R. T. EDWARDS.

The popular religion is too much diluted with self-interest, luxury, worldliness, to develop a stalwart type of Christian character. As pride and fashion invade the church, as a commercial spirit becomes dominant in the community, as respect of persons, on account of wealth, social position or political influence makes itself felt in society; so does religion degenerate into a mere form, having little and still less of the spirit of Christ. But a person who, by the grace of God, is able to withstand these influences, may not be popular, unless he be a Moody, but he can and will develop a noble type of Christian character, even in the most humble circumstances. J. G. OSBORNE.

The popular religion may be, and, doubtless is, vitiated and adulterated with worldliness, but its tendency is always a protest against self-seeking and worldly pleasure. The popular religion, I believe, is still the religion of Jesus Christ, and, though development is retarded, the leaven is there which will leaven the whole lump. Some individuals are capable of a higher life than others, but the tendency of the popular religion undoubtedly is to develop the highest type of Christian character possible in a given temperament. LOUIS A. WALKER.

2. What did Christ mean by saying (Luke 8: 10) that he taught in parables that the people seeing, might not see, and hearing, might not understand?

The truth veiled in the form of parable was withheld from the people because their minds had grown too gross to receive it. "Had the parable of the mustard seed, for instance," says Dr. Whedon, "been explained to the Pharisees as indicating that the Gospel would yet fill the earth, it would only have excited their additional hostility and hastened their purpose of accusing him as intending to subvert the existing government." They themselves, as we learn from Matt. 13: 15, had wilfully closed their eyes to the Gospel, and so its real principles must be withheld from them. To some this may have been a mercy, preventing them from using the truth to evil purposes. To others it may have been simply the penalty due them for having insulted the truth and become unworthy of it. While, however, the parable veiled the truth from cavillers, it unveiled it to the disciples (Matt. 13: 11). The unresponsive people, "seeing" the narrative, saw "not" the doctrine embodied; "hearing" the literal parable, they understood "not" the secret meaning. "The whole Gospel is a parable to him whose heart has not the key." This solemn teaching is found also in the law and the prophets. Deut. 29: 3, 4; Isaiah 6: 9; Jer. 5: 21; Ezek. 12: 2. AMELIA HOYT.

3. In view of the need of money for carrying on the Lord's work, is it right to build ornate and expensive churches?

Not if the expense entailed cannot be afforded by the congregation, and so cumbersome preach the Gospel to every creature." It is true the church should be made attractive, but it does not need to be very expensive. A plain church building, filled with genuine Christians, is more attractive than a more costly one filled with mere professors. Fifteen dollars will not add much to a church tower, or to any inside embellishments, but it will support for one year a heathen child in a Christian school, and may by the blessing of God be the means of his salvation, make him a tower of strength in spreading the Gospel in his own community, an ornament to the society in which he moves, and an everlasting monument to the one whose gift made these things possible. I therefore think it better to spend less on church buildings and more on practical Christian work. M. J. MILLER.

Money paid to ornament and beautify a church would not ordinarily be used for any other benevolent object. Cheap, plain houses of worship would not stimulate men to give for other causes. Once inaugurate parsimony in church building and you will affect the other benevolent enterprises with the same spirit.

We are authorized by Old Testament example and precept to glorify God in the magnificence and splendor of our temples to his worship, and this is no short-sighted or extravagant policy, humanly speaking; for giving promotes giving, and it is natural for us to beautify and ornament that which we love. Moreover, human nature is such that some degree of outlay is necessary to show that we really honor our God as we profess. LOUIS A. WALKER.

AN INTERESTING QUESTION FOR OUR READERS

A young reader of this journal, (Ethel G.) has sent us the following letter:

I have an unconverted brother in the Navy. He went away to fight for you. Now I want you to fight for his soul. Send him something that will help to save him. He is bright and handsome. Mama would not mind his losing his life for his country if he did not lose his soul, too. She cries a great deal. He is all the brother I have. Oh, please pick out the book yourself and ask God to help you choose it. He has a Bible, a Testament and a Hymn-book.

The question is, what book would be most likely to be the most serviceable to him? We invite suggestions from our readers. A book has already been presented, but in order to induce our readers to give the matter careful and prayerful consideration, we will send, in reply to the first answer received in which the choice coincides with the book already sent, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, bound in genuine smooth calf, and lined with moire silk, and to the two next best answers, not making the same selection, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, bound in genuine seal, with calf lining. All answers must be received at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York, before February 1st. No notice will be taken of any answers received subsequent to that date. Answers must be sent by postal card only, upon which no reference should be made to any other subject.

some debts be contracted. But, granted a reasonable amount of financial ability, the building of such churches is a significant and important way of carrying on the Lord's work. The fundamental idea is not the pride of the congregation, but the confession of such worth and dignity in God as to make it fitting that we serve him with our most and best.

It is just the idea of the sacrifices of the old dispensation, which forbade the bringing of "the lame and the broken," but demanded that each offering should be the best of its kind. A cheap church edifice, occupied by a wealthy or well-to-do congregation, speaks of a cheapened God, and a cheapened sense of obligation to him. The costly church preaches to the world of a God whose people recognize him as worthy the best that they can give him, and who are glad to make sacrifice for him. The costliest building ever erected was the Temple at Jerusalem, and never was there a building which was so significant a religious object lesson. J. K. WILSON.

It is not, especially when, as is true in some cases, there is poverty and heathenism within the shadow of these churches. But suppose the surrounding community be all that could be desired, the true Christian, like his Master, will consider the need of the whole world. And while there are so many without the Gospel, would it not be better for Christians to worship in less expensive buildings, and spend their surplus time, energy and money in trying to carry out that last command of our Lord, "Go ye into all the world, and

4. If a husband discovers after marriage that his wife was guilty of wrong-doing before her marriage, though she has been blameless since, is he justified in seeking a divorce?

Emphatically no. If she has repented of her past sin, and since her marriage has been good and true, then how merciless would be the husband who sought a divorce. Though God may have forgiven her former wandering, if she has a tender conscience very possibly she has not forgiven herself, and is in need of comfort and encouragement. From the hills of Galilee came one whose voice, tender and loving, but so strong that it has echoed through all the centuries its words of hope. "Neither do I condemn thee, go, and sin no more." Since our divine Redeemer forgives the greatest of sinners, let not this husband raise his hand to cast such a stone as divorce proceedings at her who is his faithful wife. F. E. L.

5. Is a tradesman justified in making a servant a present to induce her to obtain for him the custom of her employers?

No. A nice sense of honor would keep him from any such underhanded method. Let a tradesman seek to win custom by honest weights and measures, courteous manners and neatness, and he will be almost certain to succeed. Bribery, even on a small scale, is not commendable. FRANCES E. LANE.

He is, provided the gratuity is simply intended to further his business interests honorably and by no underhanded methods. It is a common custom among tradesmen to give gratuities at certain seasons to those whose "orders" come to them during the year, and such gifts are the compliment of good will. If, however, the present is designed as a bribe to induce the receiver to deceive an employer into accepting inferior goods, it is to be condemned as wrong. All other things being equal, and the merchant's wares being all that he claims for them, a trifling gift or douceur is not a thing to be regarded as a bribe. Indeed, it is a universal custom. Of course, the present of anything of considerable value and altogether out of proportion to the customary trifle should be viewed with suspicion, as pointing to an improper ulterior motive. CHARLES H. WELLS.

Miscellaneous Questions

Reader, Grassland, W. Va. What are the best brain foods for a student?

Fish, farinaceous foods, fruit, vegetables, moderate meat, no pastry.

Canon City, Colo. Where may burnt paper money be sent to be redeemed?

U. S. Treasury, Washington, D. C., or any national bank.

Americus, Kans. What is least amount of sleep a student can take without danger to health?

It depends upon individual habits and constitution. Seven hours are a fair general average; many can do with six.

J. A. S., Waylam, Ala. When and how did the practice of duelling originate?

Classical history abounds with instances in which individuals resorted to single combat to decide a dispute without the effusion of much blood. Perhaps the first duel on record in which names are given, was that between David and Goliath, as narrated in the Bible.

E. H. D., Reisterstown, Md. If a first-class passenger dies at sea, while on a long voyage, is he necessarily buried on the ocean?

It is customary, especially in tropical latitudes, to bury the dead at sea, except in the case of a distinguished person dying. In such an event, the remains would be preserved and transferred to shore as soon as a port was reached.

Reader, Port Atkinson, Wis. Does the United States own territory in the Samoan Islands in the same way that she owns her other islands, or is she only a joint protector of those islands?

By agreement between the United States, Germany, and Great Britain, concerning the Samoan group of islands, the island of Tutuila, fifty-four miles square, with 4,000 inhabitants, became an American possession. The other islands of the group at the same time became German territory, Britain withdrawing and receiving compensation from Germany elsewhere.

Reader. What is the history of the balloon?

The first balloon was invented in 1772 by the Montgolfier brothers, in France, they giving an exhibition of the first ascent in June, 1783. Their balloon was filled with an air rarefied by a fire in the car. In the same year another inventor substituted hydrogen gas for rarefied air. Since then, hundreds of balloons have been constructed, some aeronauts having ascended to altitudes over 40,000 feet. The balloon of to-day is made of long bands of silk sewed together and rendered air-tight. It is filled with hydrogen or coal gas.

C. H., Sheldon, Mo. Ought a young girl to correspond with a young man whom she has never seen, but who writes nice, manly letters, and who, she is sure, is benefited by her influence and cheered by her letters?

While the young woman may be, and doubtless is, acting from the best motives, such a course may prove to be very indiscreet. It is a marked departure from the recognized proprieties for a young lady to open correspondence with a man who is an entire stranger and concerning whose character and motives she can know little or nothing. Few parents or guardians would countenance such a proceeding.

A reader in Indiana, Miss S. K., of Greensburg, writes:

Call attention to the pitiable condition of our own Indians in the United States and Alaska. In some sections they are starving. Please urge Congress to take immediate steps to relieve their wants.

We commend this to the attention of our friends in Congress.

Men and Women whose Consecrated Voices have been Heard in Many Lands—The Power of Gospel Song

NE of the notable developments in spiritual work, during the latter half of the last century, has been the almost universal recognition of consecrated song as a soul-winning power. In every land where the Christian religion is preached, the story of the Cross is told in strains that touch the hearts of the multitudes. Nearly all the famous hymns have been translated into many languages and dialects, and many of the same tunes that are sung in churches, Sunday Schools and general evangelistic gatherings in our own land are becoming more and more familiar to the dusky peoples of Asia, Africa and the remote islands of the Pacific Ocean.

In our own favored land, consecrated song has long been accorded special recognition as an agent of the highest value in Christian work. In all the great revivals of recent years, it has held a prominent part. So great a desideratum has it become, that a training school or College of Gospel Song is now projected, at which, under the tutelage of the ablest living minstrels of the Cross, young Christian men and women with good voices may receive such a training as will fit them for effective evangelistic work. This idea of a College of Sacred Song originated with Mr. Ira D. Sankey, long known as America's leading singing evangelist, and whose many years of labor in the Gospel as the associate of the late D. L. Moody, made his name a household word throughout the Christian world. In several years past a "Service of Sacred Song" has appeared in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD under Mr. Sankey's direction, and hundreds of the most beautiful compositions have thus been brought into a multitude of Christian homes.

During his recent tour in Europe, Mr. Sankey sang and preached to vast audiences in the principal cities of the United Kingdom and in Ireland. At the suggestion of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD he signalized his return by conducting a Gospel song service in the old Tombs prison in New York. Introduced by the prison chaplain, Rev. J. J. Munro, Mr. Sankey began the memorable service, singing, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," the "Ninety and Nine," and other hymns dear to the hearts of all sorts of men. Mr. Sankey stood on the bridge between the second row tiers. He could not see his audience, but as his sympathetic voice pealed out the lines of "Rock of Ages," he could hear half-subdued sighs along the rows of cells, and knew that many a sullen head was bowed upon a troubled breast. Even the hard-set faces of the keepers, steeled to all emotions, softened a little. Mr. Sankey ended the service by relating a pathetic story of his experiences in a Scotch prison, and singing a Scotch dialect hymn. Later, when the great evangelist walked along the tiers, speaking a word of comfort through the bars to the occupant of each cell, he found many of the prisoners sitting on the edge of their beds, their heads bowed in their hands, and tears in their eyes.

In the ranks of America's famous Gospel singers, there are many who have been doing splendid service for Christ. Their voices, lifted in praise, in tuneful appeal and prayer, have moved great audiences to lead better lives, and have brought themselves to the cross. Their songs and hymns, their anthems and cantatas have been sung wherever churches, Sunday Schools and religious societies are found. Their compositions are familiar the world over. Among these may be mentioned Peter Philip Bilhorn, J. H. Burke, E. O. Excell, R. E. Hudson, W. J. Kirkpatrick, Hubert P. Main, H. N. Lincoln, James McGranahan, T. C. O'Kane, H. R. Palmer, George H. Stebbins, D. B. Tanner, Mrs. Joseph F. Knapp and Miss Ruth Cordis Long.

Mr. Bilhorn was born at Mendota, Ill., of German parents. As a very young man he studied music, and became a popular concert singer. Under the preaching and singing of Dr. George F. Pentecost and Prof. George C. Stebbins, Mr. Bilhorn decided to give his life and talents to religious work. He at once began the study of harmony with the late Dr. George F. Root and voice culture with Prof. Frederick W. Root. He also received valuable instruction from Prof. Hans Palatka, of Chicago, Professor Powers, of New York, and Prof. Myron Whitney, of Boston. He is the author of many popular sacred songs in use to-day, among them being "Sweet Peace," "The Gift of the God's Love," "I Will Sing the Wondrous Story," "The Best Friend to Have is Jesus," and many others. His publications include "Crowning Glory," "Sunshine Songs," "Choice Songs," "Soul Winning Songs," "Bilhorn's" and "Male Chorus and Anthems." Two of his latest productions are "Sacred and Secular Selections," one for male, the other for female voices. Mr. Bilhorn is the inventor of the smallest telescope organ made. He has used it in some of the largest churches. It has been his companion in the homes of the poor and the sick, in hospitals, factories and prisons. Many of these instruments have been given to missionaries. He has drilled many large choruses. He sang last year at the World's Christian Endeavor Convention in London. He has labored in the evangelistic field with the late D. L. Moody, Major D. W. Whittle, B. Fay Mills, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and others.

J. H. Burke has sung the Gospel around the world as an evangelist. In January, 1888, Mr. D. L. Moody came to hold meetings in Chicago, where Mr. Burke was then teaching singing and leading choirs. The committee in charge engaged Mr. Burke to lead the singing during the first week, at the end of which time Mr. Moody asked Mr. Burke to continue with him through the coming campaign of four months. "That was the parting of the ways for me," says Mr. Burke, "and I decided to give myself entirely to Gospel singing. I joined Mr. Moody in Montreal, Canada, in October, 1888, and the following winter went with him to the Pacific coast, and worked with him, or under his direction, for about ten years, in the United States, Canada and Europe. In January, 1892, I joined Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey in Scotland, and worked with them there, afterward working with Mr. Moody in England and Ireland. Returning to Scotland I joined Rev. John McNeill, of London, who had just begun evangelistic work, and worked with him until May, 1893, when we came to Chicago to take part in Mr. Moody's World's Fair campaign. In 1894 I made a trip around the world, singing the Gospel with Rev. John McNeill. We made a circuit of about three thousand miles in South Africa, holding meetings in all the principal towns in Cape Colony, the Orange Free State, the Transvaal and Natal. We worked in Melbourne, Victoria, Sydney, New South Wales, Adelaide, and all the cities in Australia and Tasmania, and the same in New Zealand. I have also worked with Major D. W. Whittle, Rev. A. C. Dixon, Rev. L. W. Marshall, and others. I was with Mr. Moody in his last campaigns in New York and led the Carnegie Hall choir. I worked also with Rev. A. C. Dixon through Greater New York. Last summer I worked with French E. Olivier in Salt Lake City. Meetings were held every night for seven weeks in a tent seating about 2,500 people. There were about two hundred conversions."

Edwin Othello Excell is another popular evangelistic soloist and writer of Gospel songs. He was born in Stark county, Ohio, Dec. 13, 1851, his father, Rev. J. J. Excell, being a notable singer, and a minister in the German Reformed Church. The son studied voice culture under Frederick W. Root. Among the songs he has written are, "Since I Have Been Redeemed," "God Calling Yet," "We Shall Stand Before the King," "What Will You Do at the Judgment?" and "Let Him In." Equally well-known is his popular series of "Triumphant Songs" and Anthems.

R. E. Hudson began singing for churches, camp-meetings and conventions when he was sixteen. After returning from the Civil War, he taught music for eighteen years. In 1880 he began composing, and is now the author of about 130 songs. He has sung in all the large conventions in this country, and has had charge of the music at 180 camp-meetings. Among Mr. Hudson's most familiar songs are: "At the Cross," "Pearly Gates," "Beckoning Hands," "Angel Mother," "Fountain Flowing," "Wondrous Love," "Father's House," "His Yoke is Easy."

W. J. KIRKPATRICK

R. E. HUDSON

J. H. BURKE

GEO. C. STEBBINS

W. J. Kirkpatrick grew up in a musical atmosphere. His father taught music. His elder brothers played on various instruments. At nineteen, while studying harmony and piano, he supervised the publishing of a book of Gospel music, arranging and harmonizing many of the melodies. It was here his earliest compositions were published. It was not until after the great Moody and Sankey revival in Philadelphia that he became personally interested in singing the Gospel outside of his own church, where he held the position of organist and choirmaster. He entered the field of camp-meeting and convention work, leading in sacred song large gatherings in many States, more particularly Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Florida. While Mr. Kirkpatrick has sung at many special revival services in his own city and elsewhere, he has never given up his regular work, to enter the field as singing evangelist. He is best known, perhaps, by his numerous compositions and books for Gospel meetings, Sunday Schools and choirs.

H. N. Lincoln has been in Gospel song work for twenty years, mainly in the Southwest. In 1885 he brought out a book of Gospel carols. Shortly after this he made an engagement to travel with Major W. E. Penn, the evangelist. Together they issued Harvest Bells. A few years later Mr. Lincoln accepted a position in Howard Payne College as musical director. Here he brought out Songland Messenger, a song book that sold 300,000 copies. Next followed Songland Melodies and Crowning Theme. In 1891 he established a music journal called Songland and Home. He is also president of the Western Normal and College of Music, and author of many musical works.

James McGranahan is among the most popular of our Gospel hymn writers. He was born at Adamsville, Pa., in 1840. At nineteen, he organized his first singing-class. In 1862, he became associated with the late J. G. Towner, and for some two years held conventions and concerts through Central Pennsylvania and Southern New York. His work in musical compositions began in 1865. His first melody was entitled "My Sewing Machine." Others followed, among them being "Nearer Home," "Say a Kind Word," and "That will be Heaven for Me." For many years he has been busy writing anthems, glee and hymn tunes, which have been sung everywhere. In 1877 he gave his voice entirely to the Gospel, and, together with Major Whittle, labored faithfully and successfully for about three years. In 1880 he went to England, where he met with great success. While there he published two books, Songs of the Gospel and The Gospel Male Chorus Book. He has also published a number of successful books of Gospel song in the United States.

T. C. O'Kane, another well-known singer, resigned his position in 1864 as principal in the Cincinnati, O., Common Schools, and entered the music house of Philip Phillips & Co. Mr. Phillips was just then entering upon what proved to be a wonderful career as a singer of sacred song. Up to this time Mr. O'Kane had been for several years engaged in teaching music and in leading the singing in Sabbath Schools and churches. The soulful singing of Mr. Phillips attracted him and the two at once became firm friends. Mr. O'Kane's enthusiasm has not left him during the past thirty-six years.

H. R. Palmer is not a Gospel singer, but one whose life-work is to make others sing, both by teaching and composing. He leads and instructs large bodies of Sunday School people, and has written many of the Gospel songs which are sung by Gospel singers, including,

"Yield Not to Temptation," of which he wrote both words and music. "O Galilee, Blue Galilee," "Peace, Be Still," "By and By We Shall Meet Him," "Master, the Tempest is Raging," "Shall I Let Him In" (words and music), "Come Close to the Saviour." He has had charge of the music at Chautauqua, N. Y., during the last thirteen years. He was the musical father of the Church Choral Union here in New York, a few years ago, of which upwards of 20,000 young people from 200 Evangelical churches were taught.

George C. Stebbins, for thirty years a singer, is a native of New York State. In 1874 he moved to Boston, and became the director of music in Dr. A. J. Gordon's church, and afterwards occupied the same position in Tremont Temple. During the summer of 1876 he went to Northfield to spend a few days with Mr. Moody. It was during this visit that his connection with Messrs. Moody and Sankey began, and from this time dates his entrance into evangelistic work. The year following he became one of the authors of the series of hymn books known as Gospel Hymns and Sacred Songs, Mr. Sankey and Mr. James McGranahan being the other authors. Mr. Stebbins spent the winter of 1880 and 1881 in San Francisco in Moody and Sankey's great work there, and in the spring of the year following, 1882, went to assist them in the close of their work in Scotland. In the winter of 1888 and 1889 he assisted Mr. Moody in his work on the Pacific Coast. In 1890 he went with Dr. Pentecost to India. They visited Egypt and Palestine, singing in the principal cities.

In 1892 he joined Mr. D. L. Moody during an evangelization visit to the English and Irish cities. They held a service of meetings in Spurgeon's Tabernacle, London. He afterward assisted Mr. Moody in his World's Fair campaign in Chicago. Mr. Stebbins has been associated with Mr. Sankey in the conduct of the singing at the August Conference at Northfield ever since they began, twenty years ago. For twenty-five years and more he has conducted the singing at State and National Sunday School, Christian Endeavor and Y. M. C. A. conventions and other religious gatherings, camp-meetings and missionary meetings. Among the best known of his hymns are: "Saviour, Breathe an Evening Blessing," "There is a Green Hill Far Away," "Beyond the Smiling and the Weeping," "In the Secret of His Presence," "Come Unto Me," "Saved By Grace," "The Homeland," "There is Never a Day so Dreary," and "The Shepherd True."

D. B. Towner, Superintendent of the Music Course, Bible Institute, Chicago, at the age of nineteen began teaching music and conducting musical conventions and choirs. When Mr. Moody came to Cincinnati, he gave Mr. Towner charge of his singing. He continued with Mr. Moody to the time of the evangelist's death, covering in all a period of seventeen years. "I was with him," says Mr. Towner, "on his last trip to the Pacific coast, which lasted six months. I have sung with him in all of the leading cities of America and Canada." Mr. Towner is the author of the Gospel songs: "Trust and Obey," "Anywhere with Jesus," "The Better Land," "Paul and Silas," and "Redeemed," all of which have been sung around the world.

Mrs. Joseph F. Knapp, one of the foremost of women singers and composers of sacred song, is the author of a large number of hymns. During her recent travels in Europe, she was invited to Sheffield, the center of music in England, where she was given a reception such as had never been accorded a musician in that city. She is the daughter of the late Dr. Walter Palmer and Phoebe Palmer, of New York City. She gave early evidence of musical talent, and at the age of nine composed her first songs "Come and Rest ye Weary," and "Better Rub Than Rust." Since that time her compositions have been heard in many countries. Among the most popular are, perhaps, "Blessed Assurance," "Consecration," "Cleansing Wave," "The Dawn of Hope," "Open the Gates of the Temple," and "Bird Carol." She is also the author of "Jesus Christ is Passing By," "I Shall Be Satisfied," "Up For Jesus Stand," "O Lamb of God," "All For Jesus," "Keep Step With Jesus," "My Lord and I," "As Thy Days Thy Strength Shall Be," "Never Further Than the Cross," "Everlasting Love," "Clinging to the Cross," "Nothing But Leaves," and many others.

Miss Ruth Cordis Long, niece of Secretary of the Navy John D. Long, is one of the newest recruits in the phalanx of American Gospel singers. She has been singing in Boston churches for several years. Recently, Rev. Dr. James Boyd Brady began a series of revival meetings at the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, Worcester, Mass., and asked Miss Long to assist in the musical part of the services. She consented, and the songs of Zion rendered by her fresh, rich, contralto voice had a marked effect upon the congregations. She decided then to consecrate her voice to Gospel song. Miss Long was born in Boston, but has spent most of her life with her widowed mother at Portland, Me. Her father, Zado Long, brother of the Secretary of the Navy, died when she was a mere child. At Santiago, on board one of our battle-ships, after she had sung, a sailor came up with repentant tears and said her singing had inspired him to a new life. This event revealed to her more than ever her possibilities in the use of her wonderful talent for the good of others. At a recent revival meeting she sang, "Where is My Wandering Boy?" and, as if in response, one of the young auditors left his comrades in the audience and came forward for prayer. The singer's face was radiant with the rapture of triumph.

Miss Grace D. Hildebrand, another recent accession to the ranks of sacred song, has a voice of remarkable power and sweetness, which has earned for her the title of "The Gospel Nightingale." She has a mezzo-soprano voice of extraordinary compass and quality, to which she adds a power of expression in the rendering of Gospel hymns that penetrates the hearts of her auditors. During the past three years she has been the leading soloist at Rev. Dr. Cadman's Metropolitan Temple, and her voice has been heard during that time at many New York churches and missions. She has sung the songs of salvation to the wanderers in the Bowery Mission, and she has also sung in the little chapel at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, delighting the city waifs. She sang to great audiences last summer at the services conducted in the Gospel tent, "Glad Tidings," in New York City. Two years ago, Ira D. Sankey heard this young singer at the head of a chorus of sixty voices, and, at the close of the exercise obtained her promise to devote her voice and talent to the Lord. She has faithfully kept her pledge.

The Gospel in the Tombs

The following letter from Chaplain Munro, of the Gospel Mission to the Tombs prison in New York, will prove interesting to our readers:

Dr. Louis Klopsch, New York City—My Dear Brother: Three hundred copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Red Letter Testaments, beautifully printed, were received the other day and presented to the prisoners as your Christmas gift. I need hardly say that this act of generosity has been greatly appreciated by the prisoners, and doubtless will be long treasured by many of them. Let us earnestly pray that God may bless these little Testaments, in which his own Word shines so resplendently, to the salvation of many souls among those who are so unfortunate as to be behind the bars.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S many other acts of kindness toward the prisoners of the Tombs will not be soon forgotten. The weekly gift of one hundred copies of your paper is looked forward to with great interest and expectancy by the inmates of the city prison, and many a kind word do they say about it. And I have reason to believe that many a sad and discouraged soul has not only been cheered and strengthened by its perusal, but helped on in the Christian life, and eternity alone will be able to tell the influence for good wrought by this HERALD of kindness among the twenty thousand prisoners that yearly become involuntary inmates of the "Old Tombs"—the great prison barracks of America.

Turkish Massacres in Albania

The terrible Turk continues to divert himself by torturing and slaughtering Christians. Late reports from Albania show that 1,100 men have been killed and 400 mutilated, beaten or sold into the slavery of harems. Men were crucified at Biluch, women violated, children were hacked to pieces before their parents' eyes. At Grumma, husbands, fathers and brothers, after beholding the maltreatment of their wives, daughters and sisters, and seeing them borne off to harems, were slowly tortured to death by various hellish devices. At Riboritz, flesh was sliced from living victims; at Genoritz, a priest of the Greek Church, was tied in a sack and tossed into the river. It is the Syrian consul at Mitrovitz, who places the estimate of the slain at 1,100, and of women carried to harems at 400. Gen. Osman Pasha, leader of the Kurd uprising of 1878, is said to be on his way to head another Kurdish revolt against Turkish rule, which he holds responsible for Kurdish assassinations of Christians.

A Memorial Church Gift

Mrs. Augustus J. Smith Weeks, of Patchogue, N. Y., recently made a notable gift to the Congregational church of that town. She presented it with the property known as the Ocean Avenue Chapel, valued at $10,000. The chapel was built by her sister, Charlotte G. Smith Keech, in 1876, in memory of her father and mother, Micah and Betsey Newey Smith. She died in 1887 and left it to Mrs. Weeks as a sacred trust, and the latter has now given it in the same way. It can never be sold or mortgaged, and is to be always used as a house of prayer, kept insured, and, in case of fire, to be rebuilt. Mrs. Weeks' great-grandfather was one of the charter members and helped to build the first Congregational church of Patchogue in 1793.

A · HEROIC · MISSIONARY · HONORED

Rev. Dr. R. A. Hume, Chairman of The Christian Herald India Famine Relief Committee, Decorated by Queen Victoria

SCENES DURING DR. KLOPSCH'S VISIT TO AHMEDNAGAR — 1. Visiting the Poorhouse with Dr. Hume 2. Under the Wellesley tree 3. Visiting the Ahmednagar Camp with Dr. Hume

It is a time-honored custom in many of the older lands, to signalize the new year by some special mark of recognition to those who have done most distinguished service in the preceding twelve months. Among the recipients of Queen Victoria's New Year's honors, recently, was the Rev. Dr. Robert A. Hume, of the American Mission at Ahmednagar, India, upon whom was bestowed the famous Kaisar-i-Hind (Empress of India) gold medal, in recognition of his distinguished services during the great famine in India last summer. Dr. Hume is the chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Interdenominational Missionary Famine Relief Committee, and with the active cooperation of his associates on the committee, has rendered magnificent service in the great life-saving work which the generosity of the readers of this journal made possible. It was in acknowledgment of his devoted labors for humanity, as the principal member of the band of missionaries who faithfully and wisely disbursed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund among the famine-stricken multitudes, that this honor has come from royalty. It is an honor, therefore, in which every contributor to the fund has a personal interest, and it is gratifying to know that the course of our Missionary Committee throughout the long famine has been such as to command the confidence and esteem of the Christian world and the admiration of India's Imperial ruler.

During his tour through the famine camps of India last summer, at the height of the cholera visitation, Dr. Klopsch included Ahmednagar in his itinerary. In his letter to this journal, written after that visit, he said: "America may well be proud of her missionary representatives at Ahmednagar, who are doing valiant service in the cause of Christ, the chief of whom

Dr. R. A. Hume, one of the most sweet-spirited, untiring and saintly Christians I have ever met."

In a subsequent letter, Dr. Klopsch again referred to Dr. Hume's work in these terms of high commendation:

"Where in the missionary world can Dr. Hume's work at Ahmednagar be surpassed? Weeks could be spent here, and every day would develop new surprises of the most delightful character. Every phase of missionary work, spiritual, physical, mental and industrial, sympathetic and practical, is here developed into full fruition. Orphans, widows, families, invalids and dependents, all cared for according to their needs, and success stamped early and unmistakably on every branch of the work.

One afternoon, while on our way to the Government Relief Works at Kapurwadi, we came to what is known as the Wellesley Tree. On that spot the native fort of Ahmednagar capitulated, in 1803, to Lord Wellesley, Commander of the British forces, and as a memorial he planted the tree. Under its spreading branches Dr. Hume and I discussed the future of Christianity in India. Dark and discouraging as was the immediate condition of the land, we both agreed that for the cause of Christ the prospect never was brighter. It seemed to me that we were at last nearing the time when the Morning Light was about to break on this benighted land, and that, perhaps, in this very generation and at this very place, the fort of Hinduism will capitulate to the Captain of our Salvation, and yield its sword to the man who then stood at my side, the constant aim of whose life is, "To make my God appear great and good and near." With an intense devotion to the cause, an untiring activity, a surpassing talent for organization, the sagacity and wisdom of a trained diplomat, the generalship of a Napoleon, and withal the simplicity of a child, Dr. R. A. Hume is unmistakably a man chosen of God to bring things to pass that shall shake to the very foundations the strongholds of superstition and darkness which now enthrall the myriad population of the Indian Empire.

This eulogium of the missionary who has now been selected by royalty for a most distinguished honor, was well deserved. As chairman of the Missionary Famine Committee, Dr. Hume, during the long and arduous period of the famine was a slave to the duties of his responsible position. Back and forth between Ahmednagar and Bombay (the latter the gathering place of the Committee) he traveled ceaselessly, with plague and death on every side. He spared no effort, considered no sacrifice too great, to forward the life-saving work. And the same loyal, earnest spirit pervaded the entire committee.

Dr. Hume was born in India about fifty years ago, and comes of a missionary family, both his parents having served under the American Board. He was educated at Yale, and after graduation took up the missionary work, and has served continuously in the same field in which he has now won such high distinction. His brother, Rev. E. S. Hume, of Bombay, also a missionary of the American Board, was chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Famine Relief Committee during the famine of 1897. His health becoming impaired, he came to the United States on a long visit, and only recently returned to his field of missionary labor in India.

REV. ROBERT A. HUME, OF AHMEDNAGAR

THE LATE BISHOP NINDE

At the ripe age of sixty-eight, Bishop W. X. Ninde, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, recently passed away at his home in Detroit. Dr. Ninde was a native of New York State, having been born at Cortlandville, N. Y., in 1832. He had the advantage of a Christian home and early religious training, his father being a minister of the Methodist Church. Young Ninde was drawn early to the work of the ministry, and entered the Wesleyan University. He graduated from that institution in 1855. His first sphere of labor was that of the Black River Conference, with which he was connected for six years. At the end of that time he joined the Cincinnati Conference, and spent the following nine years working in that city. During that period he presided successively over four churches. From Cincinnati he removed to Detroit, Mich., where he labored so successfully and with so much blessing that after serving his full term he was urged to return at the earliest period permitted by the rules of the Church, which invitation was accepted in 1873. In the interval he occupied the chair of Practical Theology at the Garrett Biblical Institute at Evanston, Ill., of which institution he was elected President in 1879. He was elected Bishop in 1884. During his long life he was unceasingly active in religious work. He traveled much, and was a careful and judicious observer. With a deep musical voice, a rich vocabulary and an eloquence in the presentation of Gospel themes, he was a most effective orator in pulpit or on platform. His life was a model of noble Christian character.

"He was a St. John," says an eminent leader of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who knew him well; "a man of sweet disposition, whose influence wherever he went was elevating, purifying and tranquilizing. Tall and well-proportioned, his coming into the home or into a public meeting seemed to bring an air of spirituality, as of one who lived near to God and was a messenger from him. During his service as a bishop, he was willing to take up any work that had in it a promise of usefulness, no matter how it might take him from home and the society of those he loved. He did efficient work in California and afterwards in Florida. When an authorized representative of the Church was needed to survey the ground in Porto Rico, he accepted that mission and did the work thoroughly. In 1899, he was in South America, holding conferences in many places. At a trying and difficult crisis in the history of the Epworth League he accepted the presidency, and to his tact and skilful guidance the happy issue of the Order out of its difficulty was largely due. In all his relations he was greatly beloved and his loss will be keenly felt.

AN · ABUNDANT · ENTRANCE

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D.

TEXT: II. Pet. 1: 11: "For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly"

DIFFERENT styles of welcome at the gate of heaven are here suggested. We all hope to enter that supernal capital through the grace that is ready to save even the chief of sinners. But not now. No man healthy of body and mind wants to go now. The man who hurls himself out of this life is either an agnostic, or is demented, or finds life insufferable and does not care where he lands. This is the best world we ever got into, and we want to stay here as long as God will let us stay. But when the last page of the volume of our earthly life is ended, we want enrollment in heavenly citizenship. We want to get in easily. We do not want to be challenged at the gate and asked to show our passports. We do not want the gatekeeper in doubt as to whether we ought to go in at all. We do not want to be kept in the portico of the temple until consultation is made as to where we came from, and who we are, and whether it is safe to admit us, lest we be a discord in the eternal harmonies or lower the spirit of heavenly worship. When the Apostle Peter in the text addresses the people: "For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly," he implies that some will find admission into heaven easy, rapturous and acclamatory, while others will have to squeeze through the gate of heaven, if they get in at all. They will arrive anxious and excited and apprehensive, and wondering whether it will be "Come!" or "Go!" The Bible speaks of such persons as "scarcely saved," and in another place as "saved as by fire," and in another place as escaped "by the skin of the teeth."

Repentance at the Last Hour

Carrying out the suggestion of my text, I propose to show you what classes of Christians will get into heaven with a hard push, and those who will bound in amid salutations infinite. In the first class, I put that man who gets into the kingdom of God at the close of a life all given to worldliness and sin. Years ago he made the resolution that he would serve himself and serve the world, until body, mind and soul were exhausted, and then, just before going out of this life, would seek God and prepare to enter heaven. He carries out his resolution. He genuinely repents the last day, or the last hour, or the last minute of his life. He takes the last seat in the last car of the last train bound heavenward. His released and immortal spirit ascends. Not one wing bears down toward him with a welcome. No sign of gladness at his arrival. None there obligated to him for kindness done, or alms distributed, or spiritual help administered. He will find some place to stay, but I do not envy that man his heaven. He got in, but it was not an abundant entrance.

Sometimes in our pulpits we give a wrong turn to the story of the dying thief to whom Christ said, "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." We ought to admire the mercy of the Christ that pardoned him in the last hour, but do not let us admire the dying thief. When he was arrested I think his pockets were full of stolen coin, and the coat he had on his back was not his own. He stole right on until he was arrested for his crimes. He repented, and through great mercy arose to Paradise, but he was no example to follow. What a gigantic meanness to devote the wondrous equipment of brain and nerve, and muscle and bone with which we are endowed, these miracles of sight and hearing and speech, to purposes unworthy or profane, and then, through hasty repentance at the last, enter heaven. Cheating God all one's lifetime and then taking advantage of a bankrupt law and made free of all liabilities. I should think that some men would be ashamed to enter heaven, or would prefer some medium place in the wide universe where the palaces are not so effulgent and the trees bear not more than six instead of twelve manner of fruits, and the social life is not so exalted.

Again, the bigot will not have what my text calls an abundant entrance. He has his bedwarfed opinion as to what all must believe and do in order to gain celestial residence. He has his creed in one pocket and his catechism in another pocket, and it may be a good creed and a good catechism, but he uses them as sharp swords against those who will not accept his theories. You must be baptized in his way, or come to him through apostolic succession, or be fore-ordained of eternity, or you are in an awful way. He shrivels up and shrivels up, and becomes more splenetic until the time of his departure is at hand. He has enough of the salt of grace to save him, but his entrance into heaven will be something worth watching. What do they want with him in heaven, where they have all gone into eternal catholicity, one grand commingling of Methodists, and Baptists, and Episcopalians, and Lutherans, and Congregationalists, and Presbyterians, and a score of other denominations just as good as any I have mentioned? They all join in the hallelujah chorus, accompanied by harpers on their harps and trumpeters on their trumpets, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive blessing and riches and honor and glory and power."

The bigot ascends with just enough grace to save him. As he comes up to the shining gate, he sees standing inside of it some whom he used to meet every Sunday morning on the street going to some other church of some other denomination, and he cries out, "Are you there. I never expected to see you in such a glorious place. You were all wrong in your religious theories on earth and in your form of church government. How did you get in?" "Saved by grace," is the heavenly reply. "Saved by grace." The bigot is embarrassed and feels for his creed and his catechism, and, lo! they were left on the banks of the river Jordan as he passed through, and he cries out, "I think I will have to enter on the same terms. Saved by grace. Saved by grace."

Denominations of Christians on earth were necessary in order to better work and to suit preferences—as an army must be divided into regiments, yet one army; as a neighborhood must be divided into families, though one neighborhood. But there is no need for such divisions in heaven, and therefore all belong to one denomination of sainthood. Christ said in one of his sermons that there would be laughter in heaven! "Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh." And what could cause more merriment among the glorified than a rehearsal of the earthly differences between Christians, differences once seeming of such vast importance, but differences unknown amid the heavenly worshippers? What will be the bigot's amazement when he sees seated side by side on the banks of the river of life Calvin and Arminius, Archbishop Cranmer and some dissenting preacher of the Gospel who never graduated, one who on earth was a robed and surpliced ecclesiastic, and a backwoods minister, who in the log-cabin meeting-house preached in a linen duster? Among the great surprises of heaven for the bigot will be the celestial friendliness of those who on earth opposed each other in wrathiest polemics. He will get through the gate, for he has a spark of divine grace in his heart, but there will not be an inch of room to spare on either side of him. It will not take long for heaven to educate him into a glorious big-heartedness.

Again, the penurious Christian will not have an abundant entrance. Perhaps he was not converted until all his habits of tight-fistedness were fixed beyond recovery. The people who are generous were taught to be generous in childhood. You can tell from the way that boy divides the apple what his characteristics for generosity or meanness will be for the next eighty years, if he lives so long. If he eat it all himself while others look wistfully on, he will be a Shylock. If he give half of it to someone who has no apple he will be an ordinarily generous man. If he give three-fourths of it to another, he will be a Baron Hirsch or a George Peabody.

The Penurious Christian

For thirty years this man has been practising an economy which prided itself on never passing a pin without picking it up, and if he responded at all in church, would put on the collection plate so insignificant a coin that he held his hand over it so that no one could discover the smallness of the denomination. Somewhere in the fifties or sixties of his life, during a revival of religion, he became a Christian. He is very much changed in most respects, but his all-absorbing acquisitiveness still influences him. To extract from him a gift for an orphanage or a church or a poor woman who has just been burnt out is an achievement. You and I know very good men, their Christian character beyond dispute, and yet they are pronounced by all as penurious, and they know it themselves and pray against it. We all have our bad habits, and yet expect to get to heaven, and this skinflint has his mighty temptation. The passion of avarice well illustrated its strength, when in one of the houses of exhumed Pompeii was found the skeleton of a man who was trying to escape with sixty coins and a silver saucepan. For those valuables he dared the ashes and scoria of Vesuvius, which overwhelmed him, and many a good man has been held mightily by avarice. But the day is coming for that penurious Christian's departure from the world. He has an awful struggle in giving up his government securities. The attorney who drew his last will and testament saw how hard it was for him to leave his farm, or his storehouse, or investments, especially those that in the markets are called gilt-edged. Those that yield only three per cent. he easily resigns to the care of his executors, but those that yield eight or nine or ten per cent. how can he give them up while the market is still rising? Bolstered up in bed, knowing he has got to sign it, he reads the document over and over again, and then, with a manner that seems to say, "Well, if I must, I must," he signs his name to that surrender of his last farthing of earthly possessions. He enters heaven, but he has not an abundant entrance. The fortune that won for him in this world much attention, makes no impression in that country where the gold is so common that they make streets out of it, and precious stones are so usual that they build them into walls, jasper at the bottom, amethyst at the top, emerald and rubies between. He will get in, for he has enough grace to save him, but his place in heaven will not be so high up or so brilliant as that of the woman whose generosity and self-sacrifice have been celebrated for thousands of years—the widow of the two mites. No room for his severe economies up there, where everything is so lavish and so radiant and so imperial and so infinite that the humblest man is a king, and the poorest woman a queen, and the stars of heaven which bespangle our midnights are only the dew-drops on the lawn of our Father's house. I am glad that the old man got in, but I wish that when his heart was converted his pocketbook had been converted, so that a thousand souls who might have preceded him into heaven through his Christian charities might have kept a special holiday on the occasion of his arrival.

But that brings me to the other thought of my text, that there are those who will, when they leave this life, bound into heaven amid salutations infinite. "For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly." Such exultant admission will await those who enter heaven after on earth living a life for others, and without reference to conspicuous. On the banks of the Ohio, or the Tuscaloosa, or the Androscoggin, is a large family, all of whom have been carefully and religiously reared. In the earlier stages of that family there were many privations. The mother of the household never had any amusements. Perhaps once in a year a poor theatrical play was enacted in the neighboring schoolhouse or a squawking concert in the town hall, and that was all the diversion afforded for the winter season. I asked the manager of an insane asylum in Kentucky: "From what class of persons do you get most of your patients?" and he said: "From farmers' wives." I asked the same question of the manager of an insane asylum in Pennsylvania, and the same question of the manager of an insane asylum in Massachusetts, and got the same reply: "We have on our rolls for treatment more farmers' wives than persons coming from any other class." That answer will be a surprise to some; it was no surprise to me. The simple reason is, farmers' wives as a general thing have no diversion. It is breakfast, dinner, and supper, sewing, scouring, scrubbing, knitting, mending, year in and year out. That mother is the milliner, the mantuamaker, the nurse, the doctor, the accountant of the whole family. She plans the wardrobe of spring, of summer, of autumn, of winter, cutting, fitting, completing garments, out of which the children soon grow and must have something else. The newspaper does not come, or, if coming, there is no time to read it. No selection of good books. The neighbors calling in are full of the same grinding routine. No wonder so many of them go into dementia. Oh! the country is beautiful to look at and a recuperative place in which to spend summer, and if you have the means to bring yourself amusements, or go where they are, or you can surround yourself by inspiring social life, it is a good place to stay all the year round. But, alas for the thousands of good and noble women who are dying by inches in its solitudes!

The Mother's Heavenly Homecoming

Now the mother of whom I speak as living on the banks of that great river in Ohio, or Alabama, or Maine has gone through all the drudgery mentioned, and her children have turned out well, good and useful men and women, ornaments of society, pillars in the house of God, and that whole family, after the years have passed by and their work is done, will meet in the heavenly country. From such a family some will certainly have preceded her, and the time of her expected arrival will be announced to all the members of that family already glorified and to the old earthly neighbors who put down their toils a little sooner than she did, and she will have warmest kind of home-coming, and she will go through the gate as easily as ever she lifted the latch of her front door coming from the old country meeting-house where she used to worship. Go in, mother! Heaven has been waiting for you a good many years. Got rid of all your aches and pains and weariness, have you? Go anywhere in heaven and they will be glad to see you. On the highest throne you will find one who said: "Behold thy mother."

There is another kind of spirit who will have radiant admission in the upper dominion. There is a fact which ought to have most emphatic pronouncement. All over the world to-day there are men and women of consecrated wealth. They are multiplying by the day and hour. People who feel themselves the Lord's stewards, and from their opulence they are making a distribution which pleases the heavens. The checkbook in the office drawer of that man has on its stubs a story of beneficence clear up into the sublime. In all the round of the world's suffering and ignorance and woe you cannot mention one worthy object to which that prosperous and good man has not made contribution. He is not irritated, as many are, by solicitation for alms. In some poor woman, in thin shawl, holding in her arms a child with rheum in its eyes, this good man sees the Christ who said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Well, this man of consecrated affluence is about to go out of this world. He feels in brain and nerve the strain of the early struggles by which he won his fortune, and at sixty or seventy years collapses under the exhaustions of the twenties and thirties of his lifetime. When the morning papers announce that he is gone there is excitement not only on the avenues where the mansions stand, but all through the hospitals and asylums and the homes of those who will henceforth have no helper. But the excitement of sadness on earth is a very tame affair compared with the excitement of gladness in heaven. The guardian angel of that good man's life swept by his dying pillow the night before, and on swift wing upward announced that in a few hours he would arrive, and there is a mighty stir in heaven. "He comes!" cries seraph to seraph. The King's heralds are at the gate to say, "Come, ye blessed," and souls who were saved through the churches that good man supported, and hundreds who went up after being by him helped in their earthly struggle will come down off their thrones and out of their palaces and through the streets to hail him into the land which they reached some time before through his Christian philanthropy. "Why, that is the man who, when I was a hungered, gave me bread!" "Why, that is the man," says another, "who encouraged me when I was in the hard struggle of business life!" "Why, that is the man," says another, "who paid my rent when I had nothing with which to pay!" "Why, that is the man through whose missionary spirit I heard the Gospel call in Bombay!" "Why, that is the man," says another, "who helped send the Gospel of Christ to the aborigines of America and caused me to exchange the war-whoop of the savage for the song of Christian deliverance!" "Stand back!" commands the gatekeeper of heaven, "all ye throngs redeemed through this man's instrumentalities. Make way for him to the feet of the King, where he will cast his crown, and then make way for him to the throne, where he shall reign forever and ever." Now, that is what I call an abundant entrance. You see it is not necessary to be a failure on earth in order to be a success in heaven.

But I promise that all those who have lived for others and been truly Christian, whether on a large scale or a small scale, will have illustrious introduction into the imperaled gateway. Here and there in some large family you see an attractive daughter who declines marriage that she may take care of father and mother in old days. This is not an abstraction. I have known such. You have probably known such. There are in this world womanly souls as big as that. They cheerfully endure the whimsicalities and querulousness which sometimes characterize the aged, and watch nights when pneumonia is threatened, and are eyes to the blind, and sit in close rooms lest the septuagenarian be chilled, and count out the right number of drops at the right time. The mother of a little child has her hands full, but the daughter who stays home to take care of an aged father or mother has her hands just as full.

After years of filial fidelity on the part of this self-sacrificing daughter, the old folks go home. Now, the daughter is free from marital alliance, but the damask rose in her cheek is faded, and the crows' feet have left their mark on the forehead, and the gracefulness is gone out of the figure, and the world calls her by a mean and ungallant name. But, my Lord and my God, surely thou wilt make it up for that girl in heavenly reward! On all the banks of the river of life there is no castle of emerald and carbuncle richer than that which awaits her. Its windows look right out upon the King's park, and the white horses of the chariot are being harnessed to meet her at the gate, and if there are no others to meet her, father and mother will be there to thank her for all she did for them when their strength failed and the grasshopper became a burden; and they will say: "My daughter, how kind you were to us even until the last! How good it is to be together in heaven. That is the King's chariot come for you! Mount and ride to your everlasting home!" Now, that is what I call an abundant entrance.

Know right well that in whatever station of life you now move, and whether your intellectual faculty be brilliant or dull, and your worldly resources opulent or poor, you may have at the gate of heaven jubilant and triumphant reception. All soldiers cannot be Hannibals and Marlboroughs, all admirals cannot be Bacons and Farraguts, all authors cannot be Bacons and Southey's, neither can all Christians be Pauls and Richard Cecil's. Do your best right where you are, asking God's help, and you will not only win glorious admission, but you will make all your life in heaven a grander and higher life. It is a good thing to have a healthy ambition in this world, and why not an ambition not to stand among the comparative failures of heaven "saved as by fire," but to be classified among those who did something worthy of immortals? The Bible distinctly tells that there will be grades in heaven, "As one star differeth from another star in glory." Will you be among the lower grades when you may be among the higher? Of course, cherubic and seraphic orders are fixed, and you cannot enter them, but in what low or high order of the sainthood you may live and reign forever you are now deciding by your present half-heartedness or enthusiastic ardor. Be the means of salvation of one man or one woman, and you stir all the heights celestial, for there is joy in heaven among the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

But imagine one of these "scarcely saved" Christians entering the shining realm. He passes in a stranger. Saint says to saint, "Who comes there?" And angel to angel, "Who is that?" He moves up and down the streets and meets no one whom he helped to get there. He goes into the great temple and finds among the throngs of the white-robed not one soul whom he helped to join the doxologies. He goes into the "House of Many Mansions," and finds not one spirit whom he helped to start for that high residence. I am glad that he got in, but I am amazed that in the thirty or forty or seventy years of his life he did nothing for God and the betterment of the world which woke the heavenly echoes. O, child of God, if you had never thought of it before, I present the startling fact that you are now deciding not only the style of your heavenly reception, but the grade of your association and enjoyment of the world without end. Are you so satisfied with yourself that you can afford to throw away raptures, and ignore heavenly possibilities, and elect yourself to lower status, and classify yourself amid the less efficient when you may mount a higher heaven?

But I am to-day chiefly addressing those who are started for heaven, and would have them know that while we are apt to speak of a Lanphier, the founder of Fulton street prayer meeting, as having an abundant entrance; an Alfred Cookman, the flaming evangelist, as having an abundant entrance; and Thomas Welch and Fletcher, the glorious preachers of the Gospel, as having an abundant entrance; and John Rogers and Latimer, and Ridley, ascending, like Elijah, in a chariot of fire, as having an abundant entrance; you also, if you love and serve the Lord and fulfil your mission, whether it be applauded or unknown, will have, when your work on earth is ended and you are called to come up higher, an easy, a blissful, an enrapturing, an abundant entrance.

How One Woman Saved a Church

IN 1891, the Baptist Church of the Epiphany, Madison avenue, New York, celebrated its centennial. Three years ago, the building was about to be sold and the church to merge its identity in that of another. One quiet little woman, in attendance on the meeting at which this motion was put, raised her voice in opposition, pleading for the life of the old church. She had not merely an emotional petition—she had an idea and a plan. She asked that the experiment be made of keeping the church open during the summer then at hand. Her words were heeded—nobody wanted to see the venerable church pass out of existence. A young, earnest preacher, Rev. Howard L. Jones, who came during his vacation to fill the pulpit, threw himself heart and soul into pastoral work, and won the hearts of a multitude. In the hot summer days, when other big, uptown churches were closed, the Epiphany stood open. The session had only agreed to the use of the prayer-meeting room, but so many flocked to hear Mr. Jones, that after a few Sundays the church proper was thrown open. In the fall, when the session met again, the idea of selling the church was abandoned, and Mr. Jones was formally called to the pastorate. The Epiphany has been steadily growing since that summer when it was kept open for the people.

NEW YORK WORKING GIRLS' SUNDAY CLUB (IN EPIPHANY CHURCH PARLORS)

The lady who had opposed its absorption into another church has not been idle. Who would think that children would flock to a Bible School—a school where the Bible is the only text-book and the singing of hymns the only recreation? It is a truth that such a school as this on Seventy-third street has been immensely popular for three seasons past in the upper East Side. Says Mrs. W. A. Hawes, "the lady who saved the church," "We felt that the Bible is not taught in homes as it used to be, nor as it should be, and it is not taught in the public schools. So we opened three years ago a school in which we made the Bible our only text-book. Of course such a school is practicable only in vacation time. We began in a room that had been a beer-garden. So many children came that we had to take three rooms. Last summer the Alumni Association of the Normal College lent us their building. With the public school playgrounds open in the same block with us, and all sorts of games going on, we have been overcrowded with children who want to learn the Bible. Their mothers are glad to have them off the street, and the children are glad to come. We cannot receive all who apply."

Another interesting and novel feature of work at the Epiphany is the Working Girls' Sunday Afternoon Club. It was a problem with Mr. Jones how he should reach the working girls, particularly those in domestic service, in his charge, it being hardly practicable to call on these during their business hours. So he set Sister Bertha, the sweet-faced deaconess, to work gathering the girls into the church parlors, Sunday afternoons, where they could meet each other and have a happy little time over the tea-cups. A fine piano and the best and brightest religious journals (among which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a favorite) contribute to the pleasure of the hour. Sweet, wholesome stories are read, and the club has a tendency to develop into a mutual aid society. One member, stricken with pneumonia, has been tenderly looked after, and many lonely ones have been cheered. The Young People's meeting begins just as the club closes, and most of the girls remain to religious service.

CHRIST SILENCES THE PHARISEES

Christlike Answering and Questioning

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Jan. 27: Matt. 22: 34-46

GOLDEN TEXT, Matt. 22: 42: What think ye of Christ?

By...
Dr. and Mrs.
Wilbur F. Crafts

9 NOW Christ answered and how he questioned the loveless Pharisees, that is what this lesson tells us, by way of teaching Christlike ways of answering and of questioning. Jesus teaches us also, as he taught the Pharisees, that the soul of law is love, and that the Lawgiver was at once Son of David and Son of Man, Lord of David and Lord of all.

The Parable that Aroused Enmity

We sometimes wonder why the Pharisees and the Jewish rulers were so hostile to Christ, their hatred increasing from month to month until it culminated in his murder. At the time of the lesson it was approaching the culmination, and it received a direct impetus from the parable of the King's Wedding Feast, set down at the beginning of this chapter (Matt. 22: 1-14). In that parable they were clearly characterized in the people who maltreated the servants whom the king sent to invite them to the marriage. Christ represents them as being destroyed and their city burned—a prophetic warning fulfilled about forty years after his words were spoken. But Christ did not stop there. He had another word of warning for them. He represented a self-righteous Pharisee under the guise of a guest, who deliberately affronted the king by refusing the garment provided by the king and insisting on wearing his own ordinary garb. The Pharisees, who gloried in their own superficial righteousness, would have no difficulty in perceiving whom it was that this guest represented. When they heard the doom of the guest, "Bind him hand and foot and take him away and cast him into outer darkness," they knew that Christ was predicting the fate in store for them. The people around would also know, and would probably enjoy hearing the hypocritical Pharisees shown up in their true colors. The Pharisees could not answer the parable, but they were doubtless frenzied with hatred. Such a man as this young Teacher must be suppressed at all hazards, otherwise they would lose the respect of the public. The best course was to get Christ to commit himself to some statement which could be used as the basis for a legal accusation. "Then," says the Evangelist, "went the Pharisees and took counsel how they might entangle him in his talk."

Master, which is the great commandment in the law? The question looks innocent enough, but there was a trap in it, aye, there was murder in it. These loveless Pharisees had not only missed the "love" which Christ was about to disclose as the heart of the law, but they were even planning, in the defense of the law, as they thought, to violate, what many of them, no doubt, regarded as "the great commandment," "Thou shalt not kill." There could hardly be a more perfect illustration of the saying: "The letter killeth." It was a disputed point among Jewish rabbis whether the greatest commandment was the law of circumcision, or the law of sacrifice, or the law of the Sabbath. The Jews enumerated 613 ordinances, 365 prohibitions, according to the days of the year; 228 commandments, according to the parts of the body. The ten commandments, which God had made preeminent by writing them with his own finger on stone, were lost in a lot of petty rules they had tied, like meshes of red tape, all around themselves. "What is your name?" a small boy was asked, and he answered: "Willie Don't, that's what mother calls me." The Pharisees might have been called Abraham Don't and Isaac Don't and Jacob Don't, for it was: "Don't do this," and "Don't do that," every way one could turn. "What sect do you suppose I belong to?" exclaimed a bigoted sectarian in a debate about some petty trifles in his creed, in which he forgot the great law of love. The other answered, more truly than gently: "From your interest in petty trifles and your stinging words and spirit, I should say you belonged to the sect known as insect." Such was the sect of the Pharisees, which would not kill an insect in self-defense on the Sabbath, as that would be "hunting," they said.

The Pharisees and all sectarians might well ask the question: Which are the really important commandments in our long list of rules? But their question was only a mean trap to get Jesus to say something which they could use with the Romans or the Jewish rulers or the people to kill him.

Every age needs the warning, "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." Saying prayers, going to meeting, giving generously to the church and to charity, that is not enough. A man may be all that and yet crucify the Lord afresh, breaking the very laws in spirit that he keeps in loveless acts. Interest has recently been revived in The Book of Hearts, a book that created a profound impression upon children in the early years of the century. Its picture of the heart dominated by Satan and filled with sins that are like beasts, is an accurate picture, not alone of the Pharisees, but of many others who have said their prayers and attended church as regularly, but have never had the love of God shed abroad in their crime," a greater crime than theft or murder. Such a doctrine is even now hardly less startling to church people than it was to the Pharisees. We are all under the spell of a public opinion which regards human life and property as more sacred than the rights of God—his right to our loving worship. For a man to count a "good moral life" sufficient, with religion left out, is as if a wife should boast, "I have been true to all my obligations except to love my father and my husband." On a cold winter evening Dr. T. L. Cuyler made his first call on a rich merchant in New York. As he left his door, and the piercing gale swept in, he said, "What an awful night for the poor!"

The merchant went back, and bringing a roll of bank bills, said, "Please do me a favor. Hand these bills to the poorest people that you know."

After a few days Dr. Cuyler wrote to him the grateful thanks of the poor whom his bounty had relieved, and added, "How is it that a man so kind to his fellow creatures has

Self-Love and Love for Mankind, Both Commanded Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. Here is a double command:

1. Thou shalt love thyself.
2. Thou shalt equally love thy neighbor.

Selfishness is condemned, but self-love is commanded. It is what we mean when we say: "Be good to yourself." The old saying will bear frequent repetition: "Self-denial is self-love living for the future." But we are to love our neighbor equally with ourselves—not less or more. As we have said before, many a mother by loving her little neighbor better than herself, cultivates selfishness in her child. A greater difficulty, however, is in loving the degraded, and the greatest difficulty is in obeying the command: "Love your enemies." They are of the neighbors we are commanded to love.

Here we meet another difficulty. Is love a child of the will that can be commanded? Careful observation will show that love is less spontaneous, and more the result of thought and will than has been supposed. We shall find love for the sinful and the unfriendly growing as we turn our thoughts to them as sons and daughters of God, brothers and sisters of Christ, for whom he died, and so our own immortal brothers and sisters, to be loved and helped, not hated or harmed.

The Old Testament a Book of Love On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

The substance of the Old Testament, then, is love. Its great word "Law" is but the expression of love. Why does a father make rules for his children? Not to annoy and vex them by needless restraints. Every law is but the expression of love. It is a path marked out by which pain and trouble are to be avoided by his child. So in the Old Testament, in the words of Browning,

All love, yet all's law.
He who learns the lesson of to-day, that law is but two hemispheres of love, will be able to say as he looks up to God: "Oh, how I love thy law!" Many talk of the Old Testament as "stern," and intimate that God kept back his love, for the most part, till New Testament times. But it is in the Old Testament God is first called "Our Father," and there only he is compared to a mother: "As one whom his mother comforteth so will I comfort you." It is there we first read the commands, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" and "Thou shalt love thy neighbor" and "Love your enemies." Let us not miss the heart-throbs of the Saviour's Bible, the Law and Prophets, which Jesus said all hung, like grapes on a vine, on the double law of love.

In the churches we have given too exclusive attention to the first commandment, expressing the relation of each man to God. That is truly "first." A man must first be right with God, or he can not be right with man. He must know God as Father before he can feel that men are his brothers.

The Lord of Love How then doth David in spirit call him Lord? Jesus having shown us how to give loving answers to hateful questions, teaches also how to develop self-conviction in men by searching questions.

Both in teaching and preaching we should use the Great Teacher's question method more than we do. Socrates used questions to make men feel they were not as wise as they had thought they were, and so prepare them to learn. Christ questioned men to make them feel they were not as good as they had thought themselves, and so incline them to repent and truly live. He asked the Pharisees, What think ye about the Messiah? Whose son is he? (Christ is Greek for Messiah). The Pharisees did not refer to Jesus in their reply, but to the expected Messiah. They said he would be the Son of David. Jesus replied: "Why then does David call him Lord?" The Pharisees could not answer. Instead of confounding him with their questions, they had been confounded by his questions. To us there is no difficulty, for we know Jesus was son of David and son of man, but also Lord of all.

"THEN SAID THE KING TO THE SERVANTS: BIND HIM HAND AND FOOT AND TAKE HIM AWAY" hearts by the Holy Spirit, the dove that drives out the beasts of sin and fills the heart with the light of love to God and man.

The Greatest Answers to the Meanest of Questioners

Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God. This is the first and great commandment. We are all prone to answer a knave according to his knavery, which is both wrong and foolish. A wise merchant never "talks back" when a customer is insolent. If no fuel is added to the flame it soon burns out, and anger gives place to apology. Meekness has been defined as "giving soft answers to rough questions," and remember, "the meek shall inherit the earth." "A soft answer turneth away wrath." It is the best answer, whether spoken or printed or written, the only kind worthy of a Christian or a gentleman. The foolish desire to "have the last word" has broken up not families only, but churches.

To a question full of hate Christ gave an answer full of love, "Thou shalt love." How that answer must have struck the Pharisees! A loving heart more important than wide phylacteries or circumcision or sacrifices, or even Sabbath observance! Loving was the one religious act they had omitted altogether. One would as soon look for love in a machine as in a Pharisee. For lack of love to God and man, which was the real heart of Sabbath observance, they made even that longest of the ten commandments more a burden than a blessing. What satisfaction does a father find in the service of a son, or a wife in that of her husband, if there is no love in it? God wants not only our obedience but our love. "This is the first and great commandment."

Not to love God, then, is the "capital always been so unkind to his Saviour as to refuse him his heart?"

This sentence touched him to the core. He sent for Dr. Cuyler to come and talk with him, and speedily gave himself to Christ. He has been a most useful Christian ever since.

A dying Sunday School boy, whose father was not a Christian, said to that weeping father just before he died, "I'm going to God; father, what shall I tell him is the reason you won't love him?" The father found in the dark hours through which that question echoed in his ears no reason why he should not, but a multitude of reasons why he should love and serve God, who cries to every soul of man, "My son, give me thine heart." Fatherhood in heaven, as on earth, will be satisfied with nothing less than love.

But sensitive souls are troubled that they do not find in their hearts quite the same personal affection which they have for a mother or sister. This calls up once more what has been said before in these lessons about the THREE KINDS OF LOVE:

1. The love of esteem, that looks up with admiration and aspiration dominating affection.
2. The love of sympathy, that goes straight out to our associates in home and school and elsewhere, kindred in blood or in purposes.
3. The love of pity or compassion, that looks down to lift up the sinful and unfriendly.

This last is the love with which God loves us in our sins, and it is the distinctive Christian love required of us. There is no credit, as there is no effort, in loving what is lovely and what we like. For the Jew to love the Samaritan and others, those equally despised, that Jesus explained was the essence of the command to love our neighbor, which we are now to consider.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Floods in Rome

MANY historic sites were submerged by the recent floods in the Italian capital. The river Tiber rose fifty-five feet above its normal level, overflowing both banks. On the right bank, a massive wall of masonry was built about fifteen years ago, after a great flood had menaced the city, and it was supposed that on that side, at least, no damage would be done. A company of soldiers, marching near the wall about midnight, felt a vibration beneath their feet, and on their reaching their barracks reported the fact. Civil engineers were immediately sent to the scene of danger, but found it was then too late to save the wall. Before dawn, the embankment with the wall and the promenade fell into the river, thereby making a dam which increased the trouble. It appears that the wall had not

It instances the case of a man with an abrasion on his foot, who put on a pair of scarlet socks, and was so badly poisoned that his life was saved only by the amputation of the foot. In another case, a man wearing a new suit of bright-colored underclothing went for a fast walk, during which he perspired freely. He was taken ill soon afterward, and his physician, diagnosing poison, analyzed the underclothing, and found it reeking with poison, which had entered the man's system through the open pores. Another case was that of a lady who had a sore on her lip, and had bitten the end off the bright-colored silk with which she was sewing, and had sucked the end too to make it go more easily through the eye of the needle. She, too, had been poisoned, and came near losing her life. Poison once introduced into the system, spreads rapidly, and unless eliminated may cause he was convicted and sent to prison. But the public prosecutor was impressed by the apparent honesty of the prisoner, so he set an inquiry on foot, which has led to the arrest of the two prisoners. He has also found a man who was present when the purchase was made. No more welcome news could reach the prisoner than that the real culprits have been discovered. He will now expect his speedy release. He is little likely to treat the news as sinners too frequently treat the Gospel message. Though they are really guilty and deserve their punishment, many of them hear with indifference that Jesus, by suffering in their place, has opened for them a way of escape and they neglect to avail themselves of it.

The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it (Heb. 4: 2).

A Father's Long Search

A pathetic scene was witnessed in the Likewise I say unto you there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth (Luke 15: 10).

An Automatic Detective

A correspondent of the Baltimore Sun sends to that journal an amusing story of the detection of a criminal. A farmer has been missing various articles from his house recently, and he had reason to believe that they were not taken by burglars, but by some inmate of his household or some neighbor who had access to his premises. Of late, valuable articles having been put under lock and key, the thief has turned his attention to the pantry, and the farmer found that his flour barrel had been the most frequently visited and the most to suffer. He tried in vain to detect the thief. Recently he fitted up a camera, been built on caissons, but on wooden spiles, many of which had rotted through. The cost of the embankment now lying at the bottom of the Tiber is said to have been over fifteen million dollars. The low-lying districts above the scene of the disaster became lakes. The Pantheon loomed up amid the waters; the Forum was completely covered, and the Ripetta Road and other historic streets looked like the canals of Venice. Happily the loss of life appears to have been very small. When the civil engineers reported that the embankment was slipping, officers were sent at once to arouse the people in the adjacent houses and get them out. In most cases there was great reluctance shown; the people, awakened from their sleep, could not be convinced that they were in danger, and thought it was a ruse of the Government to make them vacate their houses. The officers, however, summarily drove them out, and so saved their lives. Doubtless, they are now thankful that their appeals to be let alone were not listened to. There are many people similarly thankful for appeals and warnings of spiritual danger, which, when they first heard them, they resented as officious and obtrusive interference.

Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying, Let us alone that we may serve the Egyptians? (Ex. 14: 12).

Injurious Dyes

A European chemical journal has issued a caution to people who are wearing garments of the bright colors now in vogue. It says that the effort to put such garments as these on the market at the death. It is so in the mental, moral and spiritual nature, and it is a significant fact that the causes of infection are most frequently the things that are fashionable and attractive. A bad play, a bad book, or a detrimental amusement is all the more dangerous on account of its fascination, and is liable to do deadly harm.

Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? (1 Cor. 5: 6).

A Prisoner Vindicated

Two men have been sent to jail in New Jersey charged with stealing wire from an electric company. It is a curious fact that there is a man in the State prison at Trenton, N. J., serving a sentence of two years' imprisonment for stealing that identical wire. When he was tried for the offence he admitted having the wire in his possession, but said that he came by it honestly, having purchased it from a man unknown to him for five dollars. He was, however, unable to prove the fact, so

The officers complied with his request, for it was known that he was looking for his daughter, whom he had not seen in ten years. His daughter had resented some reproof he had felt it his duty to administer, and she went away declaring he should never see her again. Since she departed he has sought her vainly in many cities, and had not given up hope of finding her. Still, he had a presentiment that it would be in the morgue that he would see her, and at intervals he went there. On this occasion he scanned the poor dead faces with his usual penetration, and then beside one of them he fell on his knees, and his hands went to his head. It was the face of his daughter, cold in death. The father was heartbroken. Perhaps if she had known with what tender love he was seeking her, she would have gone home, where a joyful welcome awaited her. How many

The next day, he discovered that the plate had been exposed, and upon developing it a photograph of the thief, bending over the flour barrel, was produced. The photograph is an excellent one, the emotions, the craft and the guilt being plainly reproduced in the picture. The farmer knows the thief well. It would be easy to secure a conviction if he decided to bring the culprit to trial. Such evidence as the photograph furnishes precludes any doubt of guilt. Who can tell but that there may exist in the infinite resources of divine power some means of automatic registration similarly conclusive, which, at the last great day of final account, will prove beyond a doubt to what company every man belongs.

BRIEF NOTES

The new report of the Salvation Army in America shows that the total value of the property of all kinds held by the Army is $821,674. The headquarters record of expenses for the year was $77,005.

A significant fact quoted by a scientific journal explains why war is so costly. The cartridges for the "pom-pom" guns cost one dollar and a half each. As the guns can fire three hundred a minute, this means an expenditure of $450 a minute while the gun is in use.

At a recent convention in North Carolina, it was stated that there are ten counties in that State in which there were hundreds of people who had never heard the name of Christ, and that in Edgecombe county there were 8,000 persons outside of any church organization.

The Kind of Wife I Should Choose For My Son....

THE WIFE DESCRIBED IN THE BOOK OF PROVERBS

BY REV. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D.

THE subject of this article is capable of being stated from a totally different point of view, that is, for example, What daughter-in-law would I choose for myself? So limited is the mind of man, and so selfish is he even in his most exalted moments, that he cannot but treat every subject with special regard to his own emotions, preferences and interests. I have not only to choose a wife for my son, I have to choose another member for my own family, a consideration which cannot but affect my reasoning upon so delicate a topic. If my son were to be married to-morrow, and depart for the uttermost parts of the earth on the day following, I might not feel the pressure of the matter so sensitively; but when I reflect that my son and his wife are going to live within five minutes' walk of my own house, and they will probably come at least thrice a week for their supper at my table, it is impossible for me to bring my susceptibilities within the control of a stern or even Spartan discipline.

First of all, my son's wife must have a roomy and well-furnished head. For I like sense; downright solid human sense. I like, too, sense that is softened and varied by well-controlled and well-directed humor, not only the sense that can see a joke after it has been elaborately explained, but the broader, rarer sense, which can see the humorous aspect even of some serious things. It is pitiful to see how very seriously some people take their daily life. Life is serious enough in all conscience, therefore, do not let us fill it with a deeper sadness, so tragical as to be utterly without relief, and without openings into wider and healthier spaces. My daughter-in-law, therefore, must have sense relieved and softened by gracious humor; the humor that may make her keenly alive to the defects of other families, but obligingly blind to the infirmities of all in her own family.

My daughter-in-law must not be a mere face. I hope my meaning is clear. I have now and again seen a woman who had a face and nothing behind it. It has been a nice face in point of form, a shapely modeled face, representing, indeed, some degree of perfection in feature, yet it never lighted up, it never really laughed, it grinned but did not smile, it looked but saw nothing. If my son brought a face of that kind into my house I would banish him into disgrace and solitude. A full length portrait of the wife I would choose for my son is given in the last chapter of the book of Proverbs, beginning at the 10th verse. There is no comelier woman in all the galleries of literary art. To think that there may be a woman who will do my son good and not evil all the days of her life—what a fortune is that! What refined gold! What living light. Then how industrious is the wife of King Lemuel, "She seeketh wool, and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands; she bringeth her food from afar; she riseth while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens." She is a woman, too, of large consideration and distinct business faculty—"She considereth a field and buyeth it; with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard;" her candle burns all night, and the spindle moves nimbly to the touch of her deft hands. She is a downright clever woman of business. Any fool who has the money can buy a new hat, but Lemuel's wife can make an old hat look like a new one. That is genius! Lemuel's wife is no niggard; "She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy." If you would know what a wife she is look at her husband, for when he sitteth among the elders of the land he is known by the whiteness and the fineness of his linen. And what a talker this gentle creature is, "She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness." Her reputation stands out above the renown of her circle, every one says concerning her, "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou without doubt excellest them all."

I have thus made a clean breast of the purposes which animate me in the choice of a daughter-in-law. My readers now know exactly my policy in reference to my son's welfare. He will never be half a man until he is mated with this sweet and holy woman of the Book of Proverbs. I speak with the greatest emphasis; I declare with the whole passion of my heart, that this is precisely the kind of wife which I should at once choose for my son—if I had one.

A QUEEN OF SILENCE AND QUEEN OF SPEECH

BY BISHOP JOHN H. VINCENT

IF I had a son who needed a wife, and my words had power to place in his hand in holy covenant the hand of a woman answering to my ideal, these are the words I should write:

A woman of intelligence, that he, at his wisest and best, might respect her; gaining in culture and power with the passing years, that he might not outgrow her; independent, that she might maintain her rights; self-controlled, that she might not be easily overruled; vivacious, that she might continue to interest and inspire him; gracious and agreeable in social manners, that she might help to make their home attractive to people of taste and refinement; having a specialty in art or literature, that she might continually augment her resources; expert as a cook and caterer, that she might be able to direct her kitchen; genuinely sympathetic, that towards "servant girls" she might stand in the attitude of a friend, accounting them as home helpers and not slaves, and therefore with a delicate sense of fitness objecting to the term "servants," unless she applies the same term to her minister, merchants, doctor and banker; honoring true and pure womanhood in every sphere of life where it seeks self-respect and cultivates great social aspiration.

A woman interested in all questions of social reform, that she might contribute directly and indirectly, by example and effort, to the development of society.

A woman fond of children, that she might be glad and proud to be a mother; with industry, tact and ingenuity, that she might both entertain and instruct her children. A woman fond of reading aloud, that she might enrich the early years (and thus all the year) of her children's lives with a taste for and a knowledge of the best literature; keen to detect native defects in her children, that she might be wise in devisings and equally wise in a permanent silence concerning them.

A woman steady in the observance of religious duties, that her teaching might never become perfunctory, and that all her well-chosen and carefully uttered words about religion might always have in them the force and fervor of profound conviction and of personal experience.

A business woman, that she might sympathize with her husband's responsibilities, and appreciate his obligations; economical and prudent; training her children to know the value of a penny in the service that earns it, the self-denial that saves it, and the wisdom that divides it in useful expenditure and philanthropic bestowment, training alike to discrimination, prudence and generosity.

A woman devoted to the Church, reverencing and making delightful (if in a different way from other days) the Holy Sabbath, recognizing the preeminence of the Holy Bible over all other books, and building up into our civilization as far as her home can do it, the noble Christian elements which are the glory of the age and the government in which we live.

A woman free from affectations of every sort, scorning to appear what she is not, accounting bluntness as rudeness, and yet preferring bluntness to pretence.

A woman who is a Queen of Silence and a Queen of Speech; holding the golden sceptre which lifted ensures the first, and dropping gives the blessing of the second; loving her home better than all other places on earth, making it a foretaste of the Home eternal, and sharing with other earthly homes the qualities of grace and peace which make her own so delightful.

A woman beautiful with the personal charms which reality in character bestows; charms which make irregular features and a plain face attractive, and which thought, love and unselfish devotion make radiant. Such is my ideal of the wife I should seek for my son, if my son were not already thoroughly satisfied, as is his father.

HEARTS AGREEING AND GOD HELPING THEM

BY GENERAL O. O. HOWARD

HAVING set a proper example for my son years before he was born, by making the choice of a wife of just the right kind, he has now in his mind a true model; he has had this model ever since he was old enough to play with the boys and observe the girls. He looks around and comes as near to the model as he can. But does he then and there make his choice? Unless he is unusually discreet, he will not succeed in capturing such a prize. Why not? Because the prize also had a good mother and a good father, and so she, too, has a model, an ideal of her own, for her future mate. You see how very difficult the adjustment. Think of a young man always quoting the sayings of his mother to his intended as a means of grace, or naming her doings as a bona fide example!

But this will not do. In my sympathy I would say: Trust the boy to find his own way through all the mazes of young society. He has a good thinking brain, a fairly susceptible heart, and in time will have experience enough to enable him to launch and sail his own ship. Oh how full the world is of charming women! Where can you find faith, virtue, honor, self-denial, intelligence, industry, frugality and abiding affection? These qualities are never more apparent and more pronounced than in the social sphere of our American girls. No where else do you discover more vigorous health, more real beauty, more charming manners.

But you ask, perhaps, should your son consult you, what would you advise? This is certain: I, for one, would manage in such a matter to meddle as little as possible. Just think what a mess of it fathers, and mothers for that matter, have made of it, by injudicious and indiscreet advisings? Advice is all right, if it be given with great care and long before any choice is dreamed of. As the twig is bent the tree is inclined. Now, I think you see how a noble, dutiful son may find a true and womanly woman, who possesses all the needed graces, and how, hearts agreeing and God helping them, they can commence the married life, attended with a father's and mother's blessing.

A COMPANION IN SORROW AS IN JOY

BY WILL R. MOODY

THE phraseology in which we speak of a person "falling in love" is significant of the abruptness with which a young person discovers an attachment for another. For this very reason it usually happens that some seldom seek the counsel of a father in such matters before their choice has been already made. So it has been for generations, and the question you raise is therefore one that would, in actual experience, be almost unique.

And yet there is probably no decision in a man's life, next to his relations to God, that is so important as the choice of a wife. To make a wise choice is to find

The Kind of Husband I Should Choose For My Daughter

A CHRISTIAN EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY MRS. FRANCIS E. CLARK

IS it not a difficult question to ask of one who is spending the greater part of her time in training up future husbands for other people's daughters?

As a preliminary step I sent word to half a dozen college girls of my acquaintance, to know what kinds of husbands they would choose, and with one voice they assured me that they did not want any husbands. That put a summary stop to my investigations in that direction, and quite took my breath away. But I do not believe a word of it. I next appealed to my own mother to see what kind of a husband she would have chosen for me.

"My sister," she said, "was once asked, if you were required to choose between a Christian man with a quick, bad temper, and a man who made no pretensions to religion, but who was equal in intelligence, position and culture to the other, and whose disposition was known to be amiable, which would you choose?" Not a fair question, you say. So thought my sister; but when pressed for answer she replied: "I would marry neither of them unless I loved him beyond everybody else in the world. In that case I think I should want to help the Christian to overcome his hot temper. If I were to choose the pleasant, winsome, irreligious man, I should, by violating my own religious convictions and raining, show him so inconsistent a Christian character myself, that I could hardly hope to draw him to my Saviour, and I should very likely lose my own warmth and zeal in Christian duty." Shall I decide then that, first of all, my daughter's choice should be, or mine for her, a truly Christian man, one whose life and talents and property, if he has any, are consecrated to his Master. He must not be morose or quick-tempered or selfish. He must be well educated, warm-hearted, sympathetic, and amiable. He should honor his Master by a cheerful face."

Certainly then the man I would choose for my daughter (if I were so fortunate as to have a daughter), must first of all be a Christian, and he must not be one of the kind of whom a little boy said, "Yes, he is a Christian, but he is not working at it much." Nor must he be like that woman to whom her little daughter said, "Mamma, I found your religion in your trunk," meaning her church letter. The man I would choose must be an earnest Christian, the kind of a man who would be working at it, and the kind of a man who would not "keep his religion in his trunk." If he moved to another town he would be the kind of a man who would be likely to take a letter to that church, and for the time he lived there, would throw in his lot with that church, and help to carry its burdens. If he traveled, he would carry his religion with him.

Shall he be rich? No, I think I would rather not. I think I would choose to have him acquire the strength that comes from "enduring hardness," rather than meet the temptations that come with riches. Shall he then be poor? No, I do not think I choose that, for I want them to have at least one luxury, the luxury of living, and it is so little that a very poor man can give, even if he gives a tenth. I think I would pray Agur's prayer for him: "Give him neither poverty nor riches."

Shall he be handsome? Why yes, if I can choose he shall be "of a beautiful countenance and goodly to look to," and tall; but remember that does not come first. I have chosen first of all that he shall be an earnest Christian, and if he is that, the good looks will not hurt him, and he will certainly be more pleasing, and will have so much the more power to influence others.

What shall his business be? Well, if I were to choose it for him, I think I would rather he would be a missionary or a minister, that his whole life might be spent in helping other lives, like the parson in Jean Ingelow's poem, "so anxious not to go to heaven alone." But since he is to be an earnest Christian man, I think I would rather he would choose his own calling, feeling sure that he would help other lives whatever his daily work may be.

LET THERE BE SPIRITUAL SYMPATHY

BY THE COUNTESS SCHIMMELMANN

WHAT kind of a husband shall I choose for my daughter?" I would advise that both mother and daughter put this matter into the hands of God and let him choose for you; then and only then will your daughter's happiness be secured. If we carefully study our Bible, we will see that in the beginning of humanity God very positively and specially took the marriages into his own hand. I believe that it has assuredly been God's will all along, that no marriages should be formed except by such special orders from God. Our own choosing at the very best is short-sighted and limited and we cannot overcome two difficulties; the one is that a human being, and especially a man who goes out wooing, can disguise his character; and the second is, that characters actually do change under the influence of circumstances. You might, for example, choose a quiet, soft-minded husband for your daughter, and ten years later, after a wearying, troublesome life, find that he possesses an irritable nature; or in the character of an energetic, active young man good luck and the accumulation of wealth may destroy these qualities, and he turns out an apathetic, lazy and wholly good-for-nothing fellow.

Now if a mother is perfectly sure that in the case of her daughter it is God's will that she should be married, she has not only the right, but it is her duty so far to care for the things of this world as to prevent her daughter from getting the wrong husband. The mother's duty should be rather limited to prevent wrong, than as the one whose character and daily life are witnesses of his Christianity.

A GENTLEMAN AT HEART AND AN ASSURED INCOME

BY MARION HARLAND

FIRST, he must be a gentleman in every sense that abused word implies. For it is abused as much as the justly-ridiculed term, "lady." The educated man who is faultlessly dressed and whose manners are in harmony with his attire, is in the crème de la crème of modern society, yclept "a gentleman," although his principles may be as faulty as his bearing is correct, and his secret life as reprehensible as his manners are admirable. Therefore, I say, I would have our girl's husband a gentleman in the inward and spiritual life as fully as in the outward and visible sign. She, as a refined woman, can never be happy with him under any other circumstances.

He must, also, have tastes that are, to a certain extent, congenial to those of her whom he would make his wife. There must be a harmony of interest that will create a true marriage of minds as well as of hearts. She, to whom books are an essential to happiness and to whom great literature is an ever-delightful field through which she has always wandered, and in which she hopes to roam at will all her days, will find herself sadly ennuied by a life-companion whose only literature is his daily newspaper, and who is conscious of no difference between the children of Thackeray's brain and the hysterical creations of the author of the latest and most lurid of dime novels. There are few more pitiable objects than an intellectual woman linked for life to a man who cannot appreciate her aspirations, and to whom the talk of books and matters literary is as an unknown tongue.

A very important requisite in the husband that our girl would marry is his ability to support her in comfort. Perhaps she may not have all the luxuries to which she was accustomed in her father's house, but no man has a moral right to take a tenderly-reared girl from a drawing-room and place her in his kitchen.

Last, but by no means least, our daughter's husband must have the same religious faith as herself. I do not mean by this that he and she must, of necessity, belong to the same religious denomination, but that they must both belong to the great Church Universal, that their hope for this world and for that which is to come must be the same. This is the great essential to the true happiness our daughter would gain. When the storms of life dash upon her and her beloved, she must feel that of a surety they are both upheld by the Everlasting Arms.

HEALTH, UNSELFISHNESS AND EDUCATION

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD

THE only way in which with safety to all concerned a mother can help her daughter in the choice of a husband is when—having studied from birth the nature and needs of her daughter, and having confessed to herself that marriage is the best and happiest state—she looks about her for one whose qualities are those that shall ensure the welfare and happiness of her child; and then quietly and discreetly, and without putting her purpose in evidence, brings the two together, conscious that propinquity is as potent as any other factor. Every mother has not only a right but a duty in relation to a child's marriage. You often hear a man of very moderate desert say that he requires in a wife virtue, birth, breeding, beauty, good-nature, education, money, and other superlative gifts; so why shall a mother be less demanding in behalf of her daughter? It will then go without saying that this husband of a sweet and innocent and carefully reared girl shall be a satisfactory specimen of the race, manly, brave, and good to look upon. That means that he will have good health; and having good health he will have good nature, and good nature is very necessary to household happiness. If he loves his neighbor as himself, he meets the chief requirement for the happiness of wife and family; for then he is unselfish. The unselfish man is a natural Christian. Thus, on the whole, unselfishness is the first positive quality that I should require. For with unselfishness there will be that generosity which not only gives with an open hand, but which so regards the feelings and wishes of others as to make ill-temper and dark moods impossible. With unselfishness there will be self-restraint and sobriety and honesty and fidelity. With unselfishness, again, will be purity—the safeguard of home. In addition to this unselfishness, which is at the root of most if not all of the virtues, I should like intellect in this supposititious husband of a daughter. I would like, moreover, that he should have education. But there is an education of circumstances which surpasses that of books, that makes mere knowledge of disputable facts and technicalities seem small and trivial; and if he has that we will not miss the education of the university, desirable as that may be.

Now, dear reader, I must confess to you a secret—very probably an open secret if you have gone with me thus far. I must confess to you my dreadful poverty. I have no daughter for this matchless man.

re-enforcement for all that needs strength; to make a mistake, in all but most exceptional cases, means disaster to the best possibilities of life's career. Many men have been made by a wise choice, and, alas! many others have been ruined.

There are, however, certain principles, easily discerned, which are essential to a happy marriage. The first of these is love. Not the sentimental caprice of the season, but that experience, that once known, can never be confused with any counterfeit. Such a love that grows day by day and is strengthened more in life's tragedies than its joys. Second, it is essential to an ideal companionship that there should be community of interests, not simply in the world's pleasures and knowledge; but in the joys and interests of the Kingdom of God.

Should a son of mine then ask my counsel on such a question, I would impress upon him these two essentials to a wise choice. I would urge him to seek for the companionship of one who would inspire him to his best achievements, sympathize with his highest aspirations, rejoice in the things he loved; and last, and most important of all, one who could enter into the fellowship of his sorrows, for in the school of affliction as nowhere else, souls are drawn most closely together in love and confidence.

MUCH DEPENDS UPON DISPOSITION AND OCCUPATION

BY REV. DR. THOMAS SPURGEON

WHAT can I say on such a theme? Why, bless his dear little heart, he is only eight years of age, and it seems at present almost impossible to contemplate matrimony for him.

Moreover, I have a notion that when the due time comes he will choose for himself. So he should. I remember having very mighty and strong convictions on that point myself.

My dear father used to say to me, and it was about all he did say on the matter, "Son Tom, when you see any one half as good as your mother, propose to her at once." This advice I propose to pass on to the generation following.

What will my dear boy's disposition ripen into? What will be his calling in life? These and other questions must be answered ere I can discuss this matter to any purpose whatsoever.

Should he become, in answer to many hopes, a minister of the Gospel, he will need such an one for partner as might not have been essential to him in another vocation. In any case, the matter is best in God's hands. "The wife I should choose for my son" is the one he selects. Such ought to be for the best, for "A prudent wife is from the Lord."

RESPECT AND SUPREME AFFECTION THE BASIS

BY JOSEPH COOK

WHAT sort of a woman would I advise my son to marry? Just such a woman as I married myself! It might be, however, that my son would not closely resemble myself, and in that case I should insist that his preferences ought to be different from his father's. But the supreme rule for marriage is to make the basis of it only a supreme affection. This should be tested not only by love at first sight, but perhaps by years of acquaintance, many-sided, thorough, and of cumulative effect in the growth of regard of the deathless kind. Will two souls grow apart from each other? This, with younger people, is a question that can be answered, it may be, by years of manifold experience. Let acquaintance be somewhat prolonged and engagement short between those who would not find a misleading reticence an ambush for surprises after marriage. But there are exceptions to even this rule, for Shakespeare says of two souls that were exquisitely matched:

At the first glance they have changed eyes.

If this exchange of eyes is unforced, spontaneous, permanent, it is the Divine summons to marriage, and nothing else is equally authoritative within the holy of holies of the heart, early or late. Such a summons usually comes to a man or woman but once in that brief gleam which we call life. Health, beauty, accomplishments are important, but respect and a supreme affection that will bear all tests are the indispensable and commanding prerequisites of a happy marriage. The base of the pillar of a right marriage must be confidence, respect, unshaken as to the foundations of the world, but the superstructure must reach beyond the stars.

Thoroughly happy marriages are only those of which the shrewd instinct of human affection and passion has caused it to be proverbial to say that they were certainly made in heaven.

But this is a holy mystery into which even the angels look and forever and always find it unfathomable.

SHOULD RESPECT HIS WIFE'S MOTHER

BY MARIETTA HOLLEY (AUNT SAMANTHA)

IT seems to me that the first quality a mother would desire in the man who was to marry her daughter is goodness; since wealth takes wings, and knowledge casts a rather cold light on the heartstone when shining there alone. But the man who will be good to his wife in sunshine and shade, in youth and age, is the one likeliest to make her happy.

She would demand good habits in the one who vowed to comfort and protect her daughter, lest the protector should change into a danger, the comforter into a disgrace. She would like to have him a man who would sometimes give a kindly thought to the woman who toiled early and late to make the sweet wife he loves and admires what she is. And who patiently stepped down and out of the heart and life where she had reigned supreme, leaving him first and dearest. And she would greatly prefer that he should refrain from making the mother-in-law joke. But if she be a sensible woman she will not insist upon this, but quietly efface herself as much as possible, remembering that this has been the mother's lot since first the sons of God looked upon the daughters of men and saw that they were exceedingly and wonderfully fair.

And if she can bring herself to love the intruder, as so many have, and receive a loyal affection in return, why so much the better, the inevitable then becomes endurable. He should have courage, for there will be many lions to pass on the wedded journey and he will be weighted down by the burden of love, the care of one dearer than himself, for this the mother imperatively demands that he must love her daughter, she must be to him the one woman in the world, for love's torch is the brightest light upon earth to light the wedded pair.

He must have patience in abundance, as he will marry a woman, and not a saint. And, above all, he should be a Christian, so he will know where to get help and comfort and joy, and discern through the deepest shadows the Great Light that gilds his road, and can help her onward and upward.

He should be industrious, and have enough of this world's goods to ensure his wife's comfort and prevent her hearing the baying of the wolf at her door, but not rich necessarily, as the woman who marries for riches alone confronts the dire possibility of the riches flying away and nothing but the man remaining when all that made him attractive and worthy of affection is gone.

He should be passably good looking since it would be pleasanter to look across the coffee urn three hundred mornings in a year and behold a comely visage. He must have good sense, but not be too brilliant, as a meteor would not give so good satisfaction for household needs as a more mellow and steadier light.

POLITE, PATIENT, CONSIDERATE AND LOVING

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IF I had a daughter in the sweet bloom of her years, when a husband might loom up on the horizon, far would I be from me to choose for her in a matter of such personal importance. Yet I might give advice, and I hope I would do it tactfully, for much pre-matrimonial counsel defeats its own ends, confirms hesitation, and absolutely sends girls and men the opposite way from which the counsellor warned them.

Only on a solid foundation of true love and real respect can she or he hope to build an edifice which will last. They must choose for themselves.

I would like to see my daughter marry a man whose mother had early trained him in unselfishness at home. I would prefer a man who had as a boy lived with sisters, two older, and three younger perhaps, and waited on them all, and who had been their escort, companion and friend.

The most charming man in the whole world is the man who appreciates a woman's need of small courtesies, who never in any circumstances finds fault or interferes in what is beyond his province, who keeps to his own side of the line in home management, and does not prowl around where he is not wanted. A polite, considerate, patient gentleman makes an ideal everyday sort of a husband.

If my daughter is wise she will not pierce her faith to a man who has no reverence for God, nor belief in the Heavenly Father. A man who has no definite religious principles, no convictions, who is disposed to ignore the claims of the church and of the Saviour, may be otherwise amiable, but he will not have ballast enough for the crises of life. A profane or intemperate man should be avoided by the girl who is asked to put herself in the keeping of another. A man should be of knightly purity and stainless honor when he seeks the hand of a pure maiden.

A NEW "DOOR OF HOPE" OPENED FOR THE ERRING

TEN years ago a woman, led of the spirit, opened at 102 East Sixty-first street, New York, a haven of refuge for the most hopeless, helpless and friendless class of offenders on God's broad earth—fallen women. She called it the "Door of Hope." For this woman, her heart yearning over her wretched, ruined, despairing sisters, believed in God's love for them and in his power to save them—even them—to the uttermost. The work was a work of faith in every way; she called on God and not man for its support, and God has not failed her.

Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will recall when that first "Door of Hope" was opened. Year by year they have been advised of the progress of this work, and its founder, Mrs. Whittemore, has held no weak claim upon their sympathetic, prayerful interest. To-day over forty Doors of Hope, in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Missouri, Indiana, Tennessee, Texas, Kansas, Florida, and other States, stand as Gospel beacons and homes of shelter, inviting wayward, wandering women out of the darkness into the light. Into these portals thousands have passed; of these thousands some turned back, alas! into the night; but a great number have gone forth again redeemed. With the forgiveness of their God and the kind clasp of pure womanly hands self-respect returned; and with ability and opportunity to work, hope for honorable independence was restored. Those who had never learned to labor received instruction; and when it was believed they could stand, they went out to make an honest living, to be a blessing and not a curse, their "Door of Hope" friends aiding them to find situations. In many cases the parental home opened to receive the daughter who had been lost and was found.

As the work extended, it took on new and interesting features, and there were novel developments, as when the owner of a house of sin became converted, and straight way changed her dwelling into a consecrated shelter and devoted her life to bringing lost souls to Christ. Doors of Hope have been opened, too, in New Zealand, Scotland and France.

The new Door of Hope Gospel Mission, 805 Third Avenue, New York, differs from those which have preceded it. It is simply an attractive hall, where evening services are held. The mission was founded, by Miss I. J. Freeman, a saintly woman, whose labors for years among boys and young men had met with much success. When, in 1899, she felt called of God to open this mission, she devoted her time, talents and means unreservedly to it, and no sacrifice was regarded as too great. In a year death laid his hand upon her; and then it looked as if her beautiful work would die with her. Her friends carried on the meetings, but no one seemed ready to assume responsibility, and the lease was ready to expire. Mrs. Whittemore made it a subject of special prayer that some one might see his way clear to this undertaking, so sorely needed in that neighborhood, the mission being the only one of its kind on the avenue between Twenty-ninth and One Hundred and Twelfth streets, where barrooms and other pitfalls abound. The question "Why not take it yourself?" crept into her heart; and at last, in a sudden and unexpected manner, means were provided for the initial steps, the first month's rent secured, and Mrs. Whittemore, feeling that God would be her helper, assumed the support of the work, letting the name "Gospel Mission," which Miss Freeman had given it, stand as it was, and prefacing it with the words, "Door of Hope." To many wanderers of both sexes of all ages on the great thoroughfare, it has been indeed a haven of hope and promise. Many striking conversions have occurred there. Gray-haired backsliders have found Christ anew, and girls and boys have been drawn into the Master's fold.

Gems from the World's Great Pulpits

Living Thoughts from the Recent Sermons of Eminent Preachers of Many Denominations

CHRISTIANITY AS A PRACTICAL PHILOSOPHY

STOICISM, as a philosophy of life, had the start of the Gospel by some three hundred years, why did it not keep its advantage? At the REV. W. R. HUNTINGTON, D.D., very time when GRACE CHURCH, NEW YORK. St. Paul was urging the doctrines of the Cross on the people of the empire, the best men of the empire were Stoics. Transplanted from Athens to Rome, the philosophy of the porch had taken, at just about that time a fresh start, and if it had had in it a power to live it ought to have vanquished its unpretending rival without difficulty. It was because the message that came to them from Jerusalem struck home. It was because the prophets and Apostles of the new faith had a fairer and fuller account to give of the soul's needs than had been given before, and ways of satisfying those needs for which they had looked to the philosophers in vain. There had been nothing in stoicism that had answered to the humiliation of the Son of God, nothing that had been so much as remotely suggestive of the manger, the wilderness, the garden, the cross. Nothing could have been imagined more at variance with a stoic conception of the perfect man than the figure of the thorn-crowned Christ. And yet when the two systems had once been fairly pitted against each other it was the religion of pride that went under, and the religion of humility that prevailed.

Even now, again, it is winter, and Jesus walks in the temple as of old. Listen to him, young men. There is no voice abroad upon the air one-half so well worth listening to as his. Listen to him, drink in his words. Weigh his promises, consider his commands. He asks your allegiance, he even condescends to seek your help. Does your life look to you confused, unintelligible, a miz-maze, with neither plan nor purpose? Take him for guide, and he will give you what neither Stoic nor Epicurean, Platonist nor Theosophist ever could give, an access to the perfect way.

THE DIVINE CHRIST THE BASIS OF RELIGION

A NATURAL Christ will not explain the historical genesis of human life. The records prove that men believed in Jesus because, being conscious of sin, they found in him a Saviour who had power to save unto the utmost. All the stress is laid in the Epistles of the New Testament on his death and resurrection. His Gospel was declared to be the power of God unto salvation because in it righteousness from God was revealed to faith. Nor will a natural Christ explain the subsequent experiences of Christian life. These arise from the consciousness of union with God in Christ, based on the assurance that justice has been satisfied and the sinner reconciled with the Almighty. This is a wholly different experience from any that a merely moral influence, emanating from the example of a perfect man, could create. Nor will a natural Christ demonstrate the worth of the Christian's hope for the life beyond the grave. Christianity, in short, rests on a supernatural Christ. This is the mystery or secret of godliness. All Christian life implies the reality of a supernatural cause—compels us to see in the Babe of Bethlehem the incarnate Son of God.

THE BEST OF ALL THE CENTURIES

THE angelic music has not left the world, but is increasing, and rapidly approaching the Hallelujah chorus. There never was so much music in the world as at this present hour. The lives of individual men are better. Righteousness and spirituality are not so exceptional as in the centuries of the past. Homes are better, richer in material wealth and comforts, and in heart's love. Cities are better, notwithstanding some indications of death and decay. America is better than in the shackles of slavery, better than in the triumphs of polygamy, better than when savages were roaming through forests and our ancestors were fighting for life—when they were not robbing the savages. Better than when Roger Williams was persecuted, because there was no religious liberty, and when William Lloyd Garrison was stoned, because there was no civil liberty. Better than when we were divided, and the world saw brothers murdering brothers, in this home land. The light has banished the darkness, the walls have been battered down, and the era of a world life is here. Common interests, and common purpose and common destiny are coming to the front. This is the day pre-eminently of human brotherhood. There is war, but not so much of it, nor so barbarous. It is not the old time enmity. It is now the battle of principle, and controlled by the humane spirit. These give evidence of being the last struggles before the consummation of the harmonious and heavenly prayer: "Peace on earth, good will to men." Bethlehem's star is being seen by the world.

BLOSSOMING OF THE SORROWFUL TREE

"MANY Christians," says Mr. Spurgeon, "are like drums; they never give forth music till they are beaten."

REV. W. I. MOSIER, GRACE GOSPEL CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y. The "sorrowful tree" of India never blossoms in the day time; but about half an hour after sunset it is filled with beautiful, fragrant blossoms. Some Christians in the sunshine of prosperity never think of praising God and blessing men; but when the night of affliction comes they "bring forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness."

Said a master musician after listening to a passionless cantatrice, "She lacks something, and in that something everything. If I were young I would court her, I would marry her, I would maltreat her, I would break her heart, and in six months she would be the sweetest singer in all Europe."

"Trials make the promise sweet; Trials add new wings to prayer; Trials bring me to His feet. Lay me low, and keep me there."

These trials begin early in the Christian life. They are manifold, "divers." They last while life lasts, but their mission is to make the child of God "perfect and entire, lacking nothing." As we teach our children to master their studies and every difficulty that they may form the habit of succeeding all through life, so we ought to teach ourselves to master every trial that we may be prepared for other trials, and that thus we may become fitted to be Prime Ministers in the coming kingdom. When we realize that trial has this beneficent mission we will welcome it as our Father sees fit to send it, and we will "count it all joy when we fall into divers trials."

THE GOSPEL TO BE PREACHED TO ALL

WHAT I wish to show this morning, is that the same Gospel is good for every man, woman and child in the world, throughout all time, and that it

REV. G. E. TALMAGE, SCHENECTADY, N. Y. is just as effective—nay, more effective to-day than ever. My application to the new century will merely be the logical conclusion therefrom. If it is for every man, woman and child, it must be preached to them. If it be more effective, it will be preached to them more powerfully. My text describes an angel flying through heaven, and what he carries is the Gospel for everybody. For the moment space dissolves itself into the boundaries of heaven, and time compresses itself into the present—the angel speaking to every one who is thus brought within the sound of his voice. The vision fades away, we find ourselves once more upon the ground, heaven is invisible, the world is full of evil, the nations are scattered, the centuries have resumed their stately procession; but the vision has helped us, in that it has revealed God's plan for man, and has left us a motto to encourage and energize us.

THE PRACTICAL VALUE OF CHRISTIANITY

CHRISTIANITY makes its appeal to life. Much of the talk from pulpit and platform has been pure theory—profound discourse about man, which betrayed no interest in men. We are so busy in plying the scalpel upon religion that we have come to feel that certain forms of structural anatomy are Christianity, while the truth is, that as the bones, the nerves, the arteries, are not themselves life, but only the avenues along which life runs, so the creeds and formulas of religion are of value only as spiritual life animates and uses them. Your creeds and dogmas are only the skin of truth. They are no more Christianity than the old helmet and dented breastplate in Warwick Castle of Oliver Cromwell. The armor hangs there amid the curios of a generation when giants walked the earth, but they are as useless as an empty crystal. It is time we came to realize that it is not the creed of a church, settled fifteen hundred years ago by men who would have burned us all as heretics, that is the depository of religion. The worth of Christianity is to be measured only by its actual uplifting, cleansing, redeeming power in the lives of men. You are your Master's representatives; follow him in saving the lost. The need is great, the call urgent. Listen! Heed! Go!

HELD TO ACCOUNT FOR EVERY GIFT

THE world says that if a man have much he has a right to expect much of his fellows. Jesus Christ says if a man have much others

REV. FERD. C. IGLEHART, TRINITY M. E. CHURCH, NEWBURGH, N. Y. have a right to expect more of him. The world says physical force is to be used in dominating or oppressing the weak. Christ says it is to be used in supporting and defending them. With this interpretation the claw of the hawk, the paw of the lion, or the fist of a giant may become as delicate and beautiful as an angel's wing.

If a man have large mental endowment or social culture or position or wealth, the world says he is lifted to that elevation where people are to look up to and serve him. Christ says that much has been given to him intellectually, socially, financially, that he may the better serve and bless those who are less fortunate. If a man have stronger faith, intense love, and a keener sense of the divine favor, it is not that he may count himself above or separate himself from the depraved, but that he may bring faith and love and salvation to the wretched and lost about him.

THE CHRISTIANITY OF THE XIX. CENTURY

EVERYTHING in our life, our broad way of looking at religious truth, our busy life, our desire above all else to be practical,

REV. J. D. BURRELL, CLASSON AVE., PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, BROOKLYN has led to emphasis on the essentials of Christianity and comparative silence concerning the rest. We feel that it is folly to spend time disputing about the doctrine of election, or the apostolic succession, or the proper method of baptism, when the great world lies before us crying for help. We feel that we ought to join hands and go to work with all our might in the name of Christ, and agree to differ about everything else. The result is the decay of sectarianism and the increase of Christian fellowship. The Presbyterian is not heard as often as before insisting on his system of doctrine, nor the Episcopalian on his church as the only true church, nor the Baptist on immersion. The motto of the day is: "In essentials unity, in non-essentials variety, in all things charity."

THE SURE WAY TO FIND CHRIST

"BACK to Christ" will be the watchword of the early years of the twentieth century. And how we would like to see God's great

REV. F. B. STOCKDALE, FLEET STREET M. E. CHURCH, BROOKLYN host marshaled beneath that banner. To see the isms of the church lost in a great host as a Mason and Dixon's line was obliterated by our tilt with Spain, and one great impulse move this mighty mass "Back to Christ."

And are we destined never to find him? Will he always seem so far from where we stand? Is the sacrifice of the blood and the travail of the years for naught? Nay, nay. We look back to his cross, but forward to him. The whirling years are not taking us from him, but bringing us to him.

We have emphasized the subjective side of finding Christ till we have forgotten that he is to be found in life. Christ is found of them that diligently seek him. Not in hut, or cave, or happiness, but service. Jesus is not to be found in so-called "holy places" alone, but in the stress and strife of life. He who rushes into the battle to see how much he can make men do for him, will lose the Christ and even the power to realize him. But let him put his shoulder beneath the load of another to help, and, unseen, by his side will walk the Man of Nazareth, the Son of God. The mother who gives her life to her children will find her Master in so doing. Let a man go into business, not with the intention of making thousands of men contribute to his ease and comfort; but let him go to the same toil with the love of his fellows and the purpose of serving them, and Christ is to be found anywhere. The search of the Holy Grail ends in some service to one's fellow.

The difference between Napoleon and Washington is that one would do anything for a crown and the other would do anything for a country; and when men have come to despise Napoleon, the name of Washington, like a snow-crowned peak, will shine in the light of life that comes from the cross of Christ. Christ is found in service. And he who takes up any task of life in the intent to help his fellows will find his Lord in the performance of his toil.

THE NECESSARY ORDEAL OF DISCIPLINE

GOD does not change his word to suit the whims and fancies of his rebellious subjects. When he commands, and we refuse to

REV. A. C. DIXON, D.D., HANSON PLACE BAPTIST CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y. obey, he does not garrulously repeat the command, but he begins to act. In the blue-back spelling book which we studied in the old field schools of the South, there was a picture of a boy in an apple tree, and the farmer who had requested him to come down. On the boy's refusing, the farmer had plucked some tufts of grass and threw them at him, but the urchin only laughed. Then the farmer said he would see what virtue there was in stones, and the youngster at once glided down the tree and surrendered. The story has in it the principle of God's dealings with his children. If they will not hear the message of his Word he will make them hear the message of his Providence. He speaks of God, and his dealings are apt to be more severe until his loving purposes are accomplished. Between the first message of God to Jonah and his second there was a tragedy of Providential dealings. What the word of God failed to do, the act of God in sending the storm, shutting the prophet in prison, and delivering him from it, brought about. And when we refuse to heed God's Word we may expect to hear from him in his judgment. Wind and wave will soon write his commands in italics. God is often testing us when we do not suspect it. He did not inform Job the devil was putting him on trial. God may be putting our characters to the test when we are not aware of it. Happy the man who stands the test and receives even on earth God's "well done." But unhappy the man who, like Jonah, breaks in the process and covers himself with confusion.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM

CHRIST introduced a new purpose in life. Take no anxious thought for life's common needs; but with due regard for thrift and industry leave these to God and seek ye first of all the kingdom!

REV. DAVID J. BURRELL, MARBLE COLLEGIATE CHURCH, NEW YORK What is this work of the kingdom? It is to do good as we have opportunity unto all men and in everything to glorify God. It is to seek the common welfare and do one's utmost to make the world a better place to live in. It is to fall in with all true progress and hasten the coming of the Golden Age. The world is content to seek success, as Carlyle says, "by doing one thing and doing it well;" but the Christian must needs do two things and do both well. And the infinitely more important of these is the work of the kingdom; that is, to deliver the world from sin and bind it again "as with gold chains about the feet of God." And for this work of the kingdom a promise is given, of the endowment of power, in the bestowal of the influence of the Holy Ghost. Christ "breathed on his disciples, saying, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost.'"

TOLD AROUND THE HEARTH

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE OWL CLUB

WE call it the Owl Club for two reasons: one, that it meets after dark; the other, that the members are so wise. We are rather fond of discussion, and when we are in the mood we talk of everything under the sun from Plato to the Palisades. It was of domestic economy that we talked last night, and the question proposed was worded in this style: "Is man or woman the better economist?"

Said the Rev. Dr. Jenkinson: "It is hardly fair to use the word economy or economist without telling what is implied. If simply saving up pence is intended, that is one thing. If general good management and the taking a broad view is meant, that is another. Economy comes from the Greek and means management, not merely frugality."

"In either meaning," blandly stated Mrs. Betsey Collins, "woman is the better economist. She is the more saving—she can make a dollar go farther than a man can, and she can run a home far better than he."

"My dear lady," remonstrated Mr. Pless, who is our editor: "I am sure you are out of your reckoning. Look at the way a man manages a ship, or a hotel, or a railway train, or any big thing which requires brains and gumption and a grasp of details. You ladies have the monopoly of housekeeping, that's all, and as it is, you are forever in hot water with your help. Men keep their hands much longer and with more comfort all round than women keep their maids."

"Stuff!" cried Mrs. Lucy Pease. "Who ever heard of a strike among servants? You gentlemen are always having strikes! That one fact speaks volumes."

"Just for example," said Madam Kitty Wayne, a dear old gentleman of gracious aspect, "compare a widow and a widower, left with a bunch of small children to educate and train up in the way they should go. The widower is obliged to marry again. He does not know how to get along. But the widow, even if she has to go out washing and scrubbing, keeps her home, clothes and feeds her children, brings them up respectably, and sometimes lives to ride in her son's carriage and wear purple and fine linen every day."

At this point, the hostess brought in chocolate and crullers, which created a diversion; but the men shook their heads, for they thought the Owls had been most unfair in the club talk.

This is the way the Owls usually conclude their proceedings, but there is one feature which is most creditable, and that is that husbands and wives, friends and acquaintances, meet informally once a week and have a social evening. The men do not go off in one coterie and the women in another, they mingle cheerfully together and have a good deal of fun. Sometimes a book is brought and there is reading aloud. Sometimes there is a programme, and they have violin, piano and singing. Recitations are a frequent form of entertainment, and, once in a while the minister reads an essay, or the doctor throws light on some point in medical science. Refreshments are never omitted, for there is great good humor and much fellowship of kindness over a cup and a spoon, a plate and a fork. One house is celebrated for its nut cake, another for its salted almonds, another for its floating island and good coffee. Once, on a very bitter night, when the Owls met at Aunt Mary Swarthouts, she gave them hot buckwheat cakes and maple syrup, and not an Owl had indigestion afterward.

Story-Reading

There was formerly a strong prejudice against works of fiction, and church members were enjoined against story-reading just as they were against vain conversation and undue display in dress. Novels were regarded as great time wasters, paint. Then see that the boy has a desk, and a hanging book-shelf. Neither is expensive. Let him put up his pictures; many of those in the illustrated papers are fine for a boy's room. His punching bag, his foot-ball, his boxing gloves, his various treasures, if he is a collector of coins, or beetles, or stones, will find a place in his room. If I could not give both my daughter and my son pleasant rooms of their own, I would let the latter have the finer choice, for the girl has nooks of her own all over the house, but the boy too often, like Noah's dove, finds no rest for the sole of his foot outside his own room.

HALF-PAST THREE

From Grandma Tales

DEAR little maid of half-past three,
What worlds of beauty lie hid from view;
Tell me why do you keep Such wise secrets, sweet,
Behind clear eyes of azure hue?
While we long to fathom the mystery
And read a page of child history.

Wise little maid of half-past three,
What knowledge fills your mind so pure?
Is it deep baby lore
Gleaned from heaven's store?
Brought from above our hearts to allure
To purer thoughts; more true to be
To that higher life as shown by thee?

Wee, sweet mother of half-past three,
Rocks and sings in the tiny arm-chair
Low, soft lullabies
To the doll that "cries"—
Tending, your "children" with patient care,
May guardian angels watch over thee,
Dear little maid of half-past three.

Kidnapping an Atrocious Crime

The recent kidnapping of a millionaire's son in Omaha, a crime so boldly conceived and executed, recalls the almost forgotten affair, many years ago, of Charlie Ross. The father of little Charlie refused to pay the ransom demanded by the child-stealers, actuated thereto by a sense of his duty to the community, and, in consequence, the little fellow's fate was never known. He was never discovered, and whether he was killed, or brought up in bad associations, or spirited to another land, nobody ever knew. Mr. Cudahy took the risk of paying the ransom demanded, and he received his boy at home safe in a few hours. By the time this is published, the whole matter will have drifted into past history, and it is to be hoped that the wicked gang of ruffians may be, by that time, found and arrested. Kidnapping is a peculiarly atrocious and cruel crime. It strikes terror into every home, for while the children of the rich are in the greatest peril, yet there are degrees in villainy, and to some highway robbers a few dollars would prove a tempting bait, if they could carry off the beautiful child of some hard-working man.

The fact is that we need in this great country of ours, everywhere, a sterner sense of the right, a more determined stand against the wrong. As a nation, to which every clime in the world sends contributions, we need a strong revival of Christian sentiment, and it were well if our missionary efforts were even more pronounced and extended than they are. Kidnappers and highway robbers should be impossible in this century of the Christian era. While they exist and work their nefarious schemes, we are only half-civilized and half-Christianized. We should not be in peril from the submerged half, if we could reach that half, and it could be converted to God.

The Daily Path

Commit thy way unto the Lord and he shall direct thy steps. The old word, spoken so long ago, is just as comforting and imperative now. Which of us can see around the bend of the road or forecast to-morrow, but our Lord sees the end and knows the steps, and will carry us, and lead us, and guide us, all our journey through.

For some of us the daily path is over a familiar landscape. We never go very far from home; we seldom visit; we are busy about our household cares. Others are called to wander far afield; we have business in distant places; perhaps we traverse the ocean, and meet strange peoples and behold ancient palaces and homes.

Wherever we are, whatever we do, we may still, with confidence, commit our way unto the Lord, sure that he will direct our steps. The prophet said of old, "Thou shalt hear a voice behind thee, saying this is the way; walk ye in it." Dear friends, let us listen for that voice.

"LITTLE BROTHERS OF THE AIR"

Whether dove or robin or sparrow,
Or fowl of the barnyard's space,
The little folk in feathers
Are a dear and friendly race,
And they learn to trust the kindness

In a youthful and gentle face.
God's birds, and wherever we find them
They may claim our compassionate care;
Our wee little friends in feathers,
Little brothers of the air.

using precious time to no profit, and also they were thought to stir up emotion needlessly, and to give the reader false views of real life.

All these counts in the indictment hold good in the case of the poor book, or the bad and depraved one. A weak, hysterical, sentimental book is a waste of time. A sensational story which deals with illicit love gives very false and low-toned ideas of life. But a story need not be bad, nor stupid, nor weak. It carries its own moral inwrought in the fascinating literary form of a narrative. It paints a picture of current manners, of life as it really is, and it may have a background of historical verity which wins the reader to a severer course of history. A story of daily life, of pure thinking, of nobility, of the sincere purpose, and the brave deed will help any reader.

A Boy's Room

No better sign of a boy's refinement can be observed than his interest in his room. A boy who is a little rough, and careless, who keeps his room cluttered and untidy, will often turn around and make it as neat and pretty as his sister's, if the room itself be freshened up. Take off the dingy paper and replace it with new, and give the woodwork a coat of —BLANCHE F. Poetry is never a dependence. Try anything else. Read answer to Anxious One. I may seem somewhat discouraging, but I know you should try some other line than this.

—ANXIOUS ONE. You have inherited a talent for writing, but you need practice. Read the best books you can get. School essays are not best, however. The only way in which you can ascertain whether your stories have a marketable value is by sending them to papers and magazines, always with an envelope stamped fully, and addressed, in case of their rejection. Write on one side of the paper and send your MSS. flat, not rolled. In three or four weeks you may expect an answer from the editor. The competition in this field is very great.

Pretty Things for a Writing Table

All sorts of pretty little things may be found for a writing table. Sealing wax and tapers, a seal, a letter opener, a little cylinder, with a handle to close a letter and fasten the flap securely, a mucilage bottle, a cut-glass inkstand, calendars, address-books, portfolios. The list of beautiful objects is quite long, but the only essentials are pens, ink, paper, and a blotting pad. Whoever has those will have a very well equipped writing table.

FIGHTING VICE IN OUR GREAT CITIES

FOR the greater part of a lifetime, Anthony Comstock, the founder and head of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, has been engaged in an active crusade against those evils which are now being made the object of attack by a great municipal movement in New York City. His long experience entitles him to speak with some degree of authority on the question of the best plans and methods of dealing with immorality in large communities. Speaking with the writer, lately, Mr. Comstock, said:

"Every church stands, relatively speaking, as a regiment in the great army of the Lord. The churches should unite to destroy the works of the vicious. The work of moral purification should begin with the young, and the necessary safeguards for their protection should not be neglected.

"Women should take part in the battle against vice by preventing the emissaries of evil from entering the home circle; by the early cultivation of pure, sweet and wholesome tastes; by extolling virtue and moral courage; by shielding their children against the frivolities of fashionable life, and building up sturdy characters, so that, when their children go out into the world, they are not swayed by every folly, have no tastes that incline them to the haunts of vice, and, wherever they take their place in society, are honored and respected for their real worth.

"The vicious resorts of a great city are the harvests of the seed-sowing. It is more important to prevent the corruption of the thoughts and imagination of the child's heart than to seek out the harvest of these corrupt influences, which is readily found in the vicious resorts.

"Whatever awakens the public conscience and arouses a healthy public sentiment, is a practical help in the fight for purity. There are two essentials to success. There must be an organization to enforce the laws as they exist, as well as to prevent laws from being repealed; and secure amendments where the laws are ineffectual. Laws will not execute themselves. They are but public sentiment set in motion, and when there is no public sentiment to demand or support the execution of a law, the laws are not respected, and crimes are encouraged. We may perhaps never expect to entirely suppress vice in our great cities; even fashionable society imitates the gambling resort, and, in many cases, treads dangerously high the border-line between social entertainment and unlawful gambling. Besides, as long as we breed criminals, we must expect that they will have some place to colonize.

"As to the attitude of the churches in respect to the crusade against vice, it is one of apathy. There seems to be no united movement on the part of the members of any individual church to sustain efforts to enforce the laws for preventing the spread of vicious influence in a community. Gamblers or proprietors of evil resorts are constantly recruiting their patrons from the churches. If church members would keep out of such places, and those who move in fashionable society would withhold their patronage from the gambling dens and other questionable resorts, these places would not pay. If the persons who own property would not rent it for a saloon, or dive, or low resort, it would greatly reduce vice throughout the land."

Turkish Intolerance

ALAMENTABLE illustration of the intolerance of Turkish officials in Asia Minor is related in a recent letter from an American. He writes:

"Some orphans came to one of the Christian orphanages a short time ago, with the hope of being taken in. They were from the Palu district. That district belongs to the vilayet of Diarbekir. Palu was terribly devastated at the time of the massacres, and it is one of the most needy parts of the Turkish empire. The Americans and Germans opened orphan homes for nearly two hundred of the poorest children, but the Governor-General of Diarbekir is opposed to this kind of benevolence; so he ordered these homes to be closed and the children to be sent back to their wretched villages. The English ambassador and the American minister tried to get this order reversed, and they secured the promise of the authorities in Constantinople that the orphanages would be reopened, and were told that orders had gone to Diarbekir to that effect; but the vali was resolute, and the children still wander in their destitution. The missionaries have more than a thousand orphans under their care in different parts of this missionary field, so they were obliged to refuse them. There are still thousands of poor waifs, without home or shelter even. The larger boys and girls are sent out from the orphanages as fast as they are able to care for themselves."

THE WORD YOU DO NOT SAY

THE hasty word may be recalled,
The angry word repented,
And you may sometimes stand appalled
At some hot word resented.
But never need you be dismayed,
Nor blush in any day,
When you kept watch and ward above
The word you did not say.

For speech is silver we have heard,
And silence 'tis that's golden;
And honor was of old conferred
Upon the word withholden.
And yet—and yet, I mind me that,
There must be brave words said;
And sometimes, it were cowardly;
To close the lips in dread.

DOROTHY in the nursery can calculate the price of Ivory Soap per cake, but it would take a mathematical genius to calculate its true value. For he must take account of time, labor, and materials. He must deduct from the apparent cost the saving in the longer life of the cake, in the longer life of the washed fabric, in the labor required, in the time consumed, in the strength expended, in the results obtained. When all is finished, Ivory is the cheapest soap in the world. It floats.

HOW SHE FOUND CHRIST

The Story of the Conversion of Mrs. Sarah K. Bolton, the well-known Author

SARAH K. BOLTON had the privilege during her childhood, in Farmington, Connecticut, of attending the church where Dr. Noah Porter—father of the late Noah Porter, President of Yale College, and of the late Miss Sarah Porter, whose school has long been famous—was pastor. This good man was a father and guide to all his flock. He had great ability in inspiring the hearts of old and young to the study of the Bible, and Sarah Bolton, as a child, loved to sit, hour by hour, on the hillside back of the house and read the Bible stories. She never tired of reading about Ruth and Esther, and the Psalms seemed to her very beautiful. So much impressed was she by the sorrows of David over his dead child, that when her only brother, Henry, died, she asked her mother to use David's comforting words on his tombstone in the Farmington cemetery, "We shall go to him, but he shall not return to us."

Mrs. Bolton thinks her love of poetry, and the beginning of her inspiration to write poems, came at thirteen years of age, when her aunt gave her, as a birthday present, a volume entitled The Book of Poetry. Longfellow's "Resignation" was in it; "An Alpine Hymn," by Coleridge, and some of the best poems of Milton, Bryant, Cooper and Hemans. To the imaginative, dreamy girl, this book was full of the noblest inspiration. When she was fifteen, her teacher in mathematics gave her a Bible, which is still treasured, and whose many marks, indicating the growth and experience of life, are full of sacred memories. Everybody ought to understand that a Bible has to be planted out to grow in our youth, gathering blossoms and fruit in memory, and tender associations, as the years go on, if we are to get the best results from it. This teacher wrote her a letter, asking her if she was a Christian, and urging her to give her heart to Christ. Although it did not immediately bear fruit, yet she has treasured that teacher in her heart all these years above all other teachers, because of that thoughtful, personal interest shown in her spiritual welfare.

Soon after this a lady came to the little town, from New York City, to pay a visit. She was not there a great while, and Mrs. Bolton does not now even remember her name; but the sweet face, the earnest manner, and the kindly, loving interest in young girls, seeking in every tactful way to win them to Christ, are carried in her heart of hearts. This lady, although only a visitor in the town, seems to have felt that it was her duty to win if possible some souls there for her Lord—to gather some jewels for his crown. To a number of girls in the little community she was the messenger of Christ. How many people make the mistake of feeling that they can afford to be careless or indifferent about Christian work when they are away from home. It is a great art to learn how to use the added interest and curiosity concerning a stranger to awaken interest in the Lord Jesus Christ. This good woman had with her some copies of Dr. Newman Hall's little book Come to Jesus, and she gave one of them to our young friend. It was while reading that book, prayerfully and carefully, that Sarah made up her mind to make a public confession of Jesus and join the Church. Within a week or so, the woman who had done this good work went back home, and Mrs. Bolton has never seen her since, but during all the years of her ever-growing and widening life of usefulness, she has never ceased to thank God for the faithful and loving way in which she made Christ seem to be to her "the One altogether lovely."

Many years afterward, on the day on which President Garfield was buried, General Clinton B. Fisk and Mr. Charles E. Bolton, the husband of Mrs. Sarah K. Bolton, and some others spoke in Newman Hall's church, in London, to an audience of four thousand people. During Mr. Bolton's remarks he spoke of the little book Come to Jesus, and of it being one of the immediate causes of the conversion of his wife, and that up to that time over one million copies had been used and blessed. Dr. Newman Hall was greatly moved with emotion by the reference and the incident, and seemed to be made very happy by it.

Speaking of the variety in Christian experience, Mrs. Bolton writes: "My experience was not at all like that of one of my best friends, who spent a whole night in anguish and agonizing prayer, and then seemed to almost step into the glory of the Celestial City. For five years, until his death, his life was a most happy and consecrated one."

"Those children are fortunate who are taught early by their mothers, hymns and Bible verses, as my mother taught me. I was glad that my only son Charles, before going to Harvard College, joined the church at about the same age as did his mother. I think many of us look for too pronounced a change in our feeling—the Lord coming as in a whirlwind. The wonder to me is that thousands more, who have been taught the way of righteousness from their childhood, do not place themselves on the side of God's people, by quietly uniting with the church."

REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

The Right Idea of Life

THE twentieth century is ushering us into a radiant atmosphere of happiness which is based on the truer conception of the nature of life. It is coming to be widely realized that the purpose of this part of life is to cooperate with God in all that makes for the development and progress of humanity; and while one does not seek to hold the cheap ideal of an easy optimism, that ignores suffering and want and sin, in its self-felicitation, it is yet evident that the forces which make for righteousness are everywhere more vital and more abundant. The life of Jesus has become a present reality, and his nature and divine power have made themselves the standard by which to test our daily conduct.

There is the most practical counsel in the words of the Apostle, "As ye have therefore opportunity, do good unto all men." As ye have opportunity. The little chances that constantly occur of a kind and appreciative word, a seat in the car given up to one who needs it more, the paper, magazine or book sent to someone to whom it carries an appropriate message, the little service rendered as it falls in one's way—all this countless ministry to other lives as ye have opportunity—in this alone lies the deepest significance of the power for happiness.

Again, in just the corresponding degree to which man develops his spiritual powers, does he determine and control his own future, because he is learning how to cooperate with the power of God. The mingled mental and moral growth makes spiritual power, and the higher the degree and the finer the quality the greater is its potency. No one liveth to himself, it is true, and everyone is subject to a thousand events and circumstances outside his own choice; yet these are not necessarily influences, and it is only as that which is within responds to that which is without, that these events much affect one. "Our life is hid with Christ in God." That is, our real life is largely lived in this unseen world, and the more one is able to draw upon his spiritual power, the finer and more important are his achievements. The secret of success as well as of happiness is to establish this close, conscious relation of the soul to God, and thus faithfully and quietly accept the duties and fulfil the obligations of every day and hour, and strive, as opportunity offers, to give response, appreciation, service and love to each and all with whom the life comes in contact, and thus extend and multiply all those sweet relations of humanity that establish relations with the Divine Power.

It is curious to observe how hard it is for some people to give up coffee drinking after they have become, at least half satisfied, that it is the cause of their ill health, but it becomes an easy task to give it up when one takes Postum Food Coffee in its place, providing, of course, that Postum is made according to directions, for then it has the rich, beautiful color, and a satisfying taste, while the rapid improvement in health clinches the argument.

A young lady at Cambridgeport, Mass., says: "When it was shown to me plainly that my ill health and excessive nervousness was largely due to the coffee habit, I realized that I must give it up, but it was next to impossible to do so. However, I made the trial, and took Postum Food Coffee, with the mental reservation of the 'privilege,' as I termed it, of drinking coffee once a week."

"Little did I dream what a true friend Postum was destined to become to me. The old stomach trouble left, the nervousness vanished, and good, natural, healthy sleep came to my relief. In less than six months I felt like another person, I was so well and happy."

The 'reserve privilege' in regard to using regular coffee was thrown to the winds. I have not the slightest desire for it; in fact, I very much prefer my Postum to any coffee."

Is He the Oldest Minister?

In a secluded spot in the heart of the Rocky Mountains, far from railroad or city, and with but one or two neighbors in several miles; in a log house and living in true pioneer style, dwells the soldier, mineralogist, poet and teacher, "Father Vipond." Rev. Thomas Harrison Vipond was born in Aberdeen-shire, Scotland, in the year 1806, and is therefore in his ninety-fifth year. When a young man he emigrated to America, and for upwards of sixty years has preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ in the land of his adoption. He still preaches and is ever the central figure at the conferences of the Free Methodist Church.

THE NEW CENTURY ELECTRIC ILLUMINATION AT CITY HALL, NEW YORK

Father Vipond is also a successful mineralogist. Several valuable mines have been located by him, and his collection of specimens is the result of his extensive knowledge and wide research. He still takes great pleasure in wandering over the hills alone, amid which he lives, examining the rocks and praising the God who made them. Inheriting a strong physical body from his sturdy Highland ancestry, with an innate desire for adventure, and imbued with the missionary spirit, Father Vipond has lived an arduous life. He fought under General Grant throughout the Civil War, and is now on the pension list of "Uncle Sam." With a Paul-like interest in God's chosen people, the great study of Father Vipond for thirty years has been the Jewish race, and students from far and near consult him on this great subject. He has been a close student and his mind is a vast storehouse of knowledge. He has written a great deal in prose and verse, and it is his delight to repeat his verses to those who visit him. At the advanced age of ninety-four years he is still hale and hearty, and speaks with a steady voice. The last time I visited him he repeated to me the following, entitled, "My Ain Countrie," which shows his mind to be still strong and active:

I am gangin' to my hame, for this earth is no my rest,
But I'll tarry here awhile for my Father kens it's best.
He'll come and tak' me ower, when frae earth I'm fully free
For the pearly gates stan' open in my ain countrie.
I am waitin' by the burn till the Saviour bids me come,
There is room eneuch in glory an my ain palace hame.
So I'll wait jist a wee, for it canna much langer be Till he tak's me awa' to my ain countrie.
The licht is gettin' lighter as I near my hame above,
An' my hert is rinnin' ower wi' a Saviour's meltin' love,
An' my wee anes they are waitin' to see me cross the flood,
For they ken my soul is washed in my ain Saviour's bluid.
My griefs will soon be ower, an' my een be wip'd dry,
The glory flicks upon me, through the openin' in the sky.
An' my Saviour looks an' smiles, an' bids me a' be free
Till he tak's me awa' to my ain countrie.
So I'll bid my freens fareweel, till I meet them a' above,
An' there unite in singin' the Saviour's dyin' love.
For my locks are gettin' white, an' my een are gettin' dim;
But my faith is growin' stronger as I put my trust in Him.
An' my hame awa' up on yon'er, is bonny, bricht an' fair;
An' the singin' o' the angels is so pure and sweet and rare,
That I lang to cross the burn, an' frae earthly ties be free,
An' sing amang the bluid-washed in my ain countrie.

An Electric Welcome

New York's historic City Hall, as it appeared, midnight, 1900-1901, at the death of the old and birth of the new century, will linger long in the memories of a multitude, as a brilliant and beautiful spectacle. The century, which began in candle-light, went out in a blaze of electric glory; and the crowd, concentrated in and around the plaza, watching the transition, exceeded in numbers the population of the entire city in 1800. Chains of electric light, red, white and blue, swung from column to column and girdled the topmost heights of the building; and the legend: "Welcome, Twentieth Century!" flashed a greeting to the new monarch of time. After choral and instrumental music and the ringing of bells, the lights went out and the City Hall stood in darkness at midnight, while the old century passed away. Then from the roof a great bomb rose bright and glorious; lights came forth everywhere; gorgeous tongues of flame soared from the tops of surrounding skyscrapers, and the rosy heavens rained showers of gold and crimson. The new century was born.

Presbyterianism in New York

The recent census shows that while in the city of New York the population has increased from 1,520,301 in 1890 to 2,050,600 in 1900, there are now only 52 Presbyterian churches in the city, while in 1890 there were 56.

Volumes might be written in praise of a popular remedy for the creating of rich new blood and the up-building of a worn out body, but it is doubtful if anything half so convincing could be demonstrated as is done by the interesting story related by Mr. Edward T. Dudley, a practicing attorney for twenty-five years in San Francisco, with offices at 83 City Hall Avenue. Twelve years ago, when thirty-nine years of age, Mr. Dudley lost his balance while standing upon the rear platform of a street car, causing him to fall, striking the ground with the back of his head, which brought on a feeling of numbness and eventually paralysis, loss of memory and strength which, however, has yielded to proper treatment as explained by him hereafter.

"After the fall from the car I passed it by as an accident that had left no apparent ill effects; yet a few weeks later, in endeavoring to get on a car, I found I could not raise my foot. From this time paralysis began in my feet and in time my lower limbs became numb. From being a strong, healthy man of 180 pounds, I was reduced to 145 pounds, and my doctor told my wife that it was only a question of time when I should have to take to my bed. Medicines prescribed by the doctors did no good, and at the time I started to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, if I fell down I could not get up again unassisted. I could scarcely walk a block. Now I can walk three or four miles without fatigue, and as you see, can lift my leg and am altogether a different man—and all from eight or nine boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

"After trying Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, I could see in a very short time my health and general system was much improved, and I can assert that as a blood maker and builder of the system, it is invaluable, as my increase in weight from 145 to 185 pounds I can lay to nothing else than Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

"I have recommended them to hundreds, and shall continue to do so."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

RAMBLES IN COLONIAL BYWAYS*

AT a time when public interest is widely exercised in behalf of the movement for the preservation of the places that are landmarks in American history, the appearance of a book dealing very entertainingly and instructively with the general subject is most opportune. Rambles in Colonial Byways, by R. R. Wilson, will be found of unusual value to all students of history and biography, as well as interesting to the general reader. Comprehensive, yet simple in its scheme of treatment, it includes in the course of its pleasant descriptive chapters a great number of the places, buildings and incidents of the early colonial period, and contains, besides, a rich fund of anecdote and really valuable Americana. The "Rambles in Old New York," in the country of the Patroons, along the historic Hudson, and up and down the shores of Delaware, Maryland and Virginia; the pilgrimages to the birthplaces of many whose names adorn our nation's history; the quaint description of the old-time religious and social communities of Pennsylvania and other States, including the Dunkards, the Moravians, the mystical communities of Zoar, Amana and Economy; the story of the old Penn Manor and its surroundings, and, probably best of all, the extremely interesting chapter on "Washington's Country," with a budget of reminiscence and anecdote concerning "the Father of his Country," will all be read with more than ordinary enjoyment and profit.

In the chapter on "Washington's Country" there are many new incidents that do not appear in the usual biographies. One of these is given below:

After Adams had been chosen President, and the outcry against the Alien and Sedition laws became so loud as to arouse Washington's apprehension that the Republicans might carry the country to the other extreme and the work of disintegration be commenced, he sent a message to Richmond with a note to John Marshall, afterwards Chief Justice, saying he wished him to come to Mount Vernon for a week's visit. Marshall, who was an ardent Federalist, got ready, and in a few days reached Mount Vernon, where he was received with great cordiality.

After dinner, when all the other company had retired to the sitting-room, Washington detained Marshall, and soon told him why he had sent for him. "I am uneasy, Major Marshall," said he, "at the rapid growth of these democratic societies and alarmed at the tendency towards the disintegration of our present system. The press is attacking all who wish to maintain the Federal government in its integrity and strength with great violence, and I fear the result of the approaching elections. We need our strongest and most patriotic men in Congress, and I want you to return to Richmond and announce yourself as a candidate."

Marshall made answer that it was impossible; that he was a poor man, dependent upon his practice at the bar, and that the pecuniary sacrifice would be more than he could bear in his present straitened circumstances. Washington argued with him, and soon got wrought into a violent passion. No patriot, he declared, would refuse to serve his country in such an emergency; he had been making personal sacrifices for the public all his life, and no one deserving the name of a man would refuse such a call.

Marshall, in describing the occurrence, said he had never received such a torrent of abuse in his life. He thought at one time Washington would jump on him from across the table. He retired that night, but could not sleep. The insults given him seemed to blister his brain. After rolling and tossing for a time, he concluded he would get up early in the morning, slip out, get his horse, and start home before breakfast. Morning at last came, and as soon as he could see well he dressed. Fearing to awake Washington, he took his boots in his hand and started down the stairway in his stocking feet; but to his horror he met Washington in the hall.

"Where are you going, Major Marshall?"

"I was going out, sir."

"It is too early for you to rise, sir. Return to your room, and I will have you called when breakfast is ready."

Marshall returned to his room, as he said, "to await further orders."

At breakfast Washington was very polite to him. Afterwards he informed Marshall that the horses were ready and that they would ride over the plantation. They rode, returning at three o'clock to dinner. No allusion was made to the row of the previous night. The result of it all was that Marshall stayed the week out, returned to Richmond, ran for Congress, was elected, and took every post that the general wanted him to take. Yet Washington's biographers merely tell us that Marshall was "persuaded by him to enter 'Congress!'"

The story of the founding of Bethlehem, Pa., is thus related:

Time has wrought many changes, but the spirit of Zinzendorf still hovers over Bethlehem and Nazareth, and the Moravians of today remain faithful to the beautiful creed and the tender and gracious traditions of their fathers. Bethlehem nestles among the hills of Pennsylvania's beautiful Lehigh valley, and its ancient buildings, elbowed by snug modern houses, silently recount a peaceful history, dating back to the time when three score years more than a century ago, a small Moravian missionary band took shelter by Lehigh's stream, and founded there, amid forest hills and on land bought from William Penn, a wilderness home.

It was in the early winter of 1740, that the founders of Bethlehem cut down the first trees, and built the log hut which sheltered themselves and their animals until the return of spring. Previous to that time a handful of Moravians had settled in Georgia, but when England began war against Spain and demanded that the peace-loving Moravians should perform military service, they concluded to remove to Pennsylvania. Count Zinzendorf, their leader, arrived from Germany before the second house in the new settlement was completed, and celebrated the Christmas eve of 1741 with his followers. The latter had intended to call their new home Beth Leschem—house upon the Lehigh—but towards midnight of the Christmas Eve in question, Zinzendorf, deeply moved by the spirit of the occasion, seized a blazing torch, and marching around the room, began singing a German hymn:

"Not from Jerusalem, but from Bethlehem, comes that which benefits my soul."

And thus it was that the infant settlement came to be called Bethlehem.

GOV'T LUNCHES.

Eminent Doctor Orders Grape-Nuts.

An old physician in Washington, D. C. comments on the general practice government employes have of taking with them for luncheon, buttered rolls and a variety of not nutritious articles of food which they bolt down and go on with their work.

Ultimately dyspepsia and gastric trouble ensue, and in all such cases where he has been called in for consultation, the order have been to abandon all sorts of food for the noonday lunch, except Grape-Nuts, which is a ready-cooked, predigested food and a concentrated form of nourishment.

This is eaten with a little fresh milk or cream which can be secured from the vendor who pass through the buildings during the noon hour. The doctor says: "For many reasons I would prefer not to have my name used publicly. Do not object to your furnishing same to any honest inquirer. I have been prescribing Grape-Nuts in numerous cases for about a year and a half and am pleased to say my patients have reason to be thoroughly satisfied with the results. I am myself a strong believer in Grape-Nuts and shall continue to be so long as the preparation gives the results I have obtained thus far." The doctor's name can be had of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

MISSIONS and RESOLUTIONS*

The Need of a Vigorous Effort to Send the Gospel to Un evangelized Lands...

VERY valid was the reason Paul assigned for his missionary activity. In the expressive diction of our day, he knew that he had a good thing. We know what that means in business; how the consciousness that the article in which a man is dealing, is genuine and will give satisfaction to the purchaser, imparts confidence to the vender. He goes ahead, making it known by talk and by advertisement, fully convinced that it will do the thing that he declares it will do. He wants everyone to know of it, so that all who are need of such an article may have it. There is, of course, an interested side to such enthusiasm, in the fact that he derives a profit from the sale. But there might be enthusiasm without profit. We can imagine a physician who had discovered a cure for snake-bite or some prevalent disease, being very anxious to get people to try his remedy, even though he personally gained nothing by their doing so. If he loved mankind very much and had a genuine sympathy for suffering humanity, he would be unable to bear the sight of suffering which his remedy would cure. A noble-minded man would go among the afflicted, administering his remedy and announcing everywhere the possibility of relief. That would be a grand way of spending life, and even if he wore himself out in the effort and died a pauper, he would enjoy a gratification that would be very pleasant to him.

Paul's confidence in the Gospel was fully justified. Not only had he tried it himself, and experienced in his own fiery nature, full of strong passions and superabundant energy, the virtue of this remedy, but he had administered it to all sorts and conditions of men, and had never known it fail. The hide-bound Jew, with his Pharisaism and elaborate ritual, had found in it a power he never obtained from his fasts and feasts and observances. The cultured Greek had proved it to be more efficacious than his philosophy. The lawless tribes of Galatia had tested it and had become new men. Even the sensual and vicious people of Corinth had become pure of life under its influence. It was good for sinners of all kinds. Paul had witnessed the transformations it had effected, so, with his burning love of souls, he declares himself ready to go anywhere to proclaim it. One must admire such devotion. There are some men who would not trouble themselves about other people. Being delivered themselves, they have all they want. Like Cain, they do not consider themselves their brother's keeper. But that is not this man's spirit. His heart goes out in sympathy to the man vainly striving to overcome his propensities; to the man so sunk in the mire of sin that he does not attempt to struggle. He is sorry for them, and he longs to impart the secret that will give them the victory. And think how widely he disseminated it! Nothing daunted him. He faced perils of shipwreck, perils of robbers, perils of raptors, that he might carry the good news to some other land, and even welcomed imprisonment that he might be taken to Rome, where he would preach it in the world's capital.

If he had left behind him many successors, with his love and confidence and energy, the world would have been speedily evangelized. But there came a period of lethargy, and all over the world men lied without the knowledge of the secret that they needed so bitterly. And how is it now? Why is it that so comparatively few are found uttering Paul's declaration: "I am ready to preach"? Is it that we have lost confidence in the old Gospel? Strange would that be, when in every town and in every land there are living witnesses that the Gospel is still "the power of God unto salvation." Or is it that we care less what becomes of our brothers? That, too, is inconceivable, in a period when men of all lands and all races are being drawn into closer and more intimate association, and we are discovering how like we are to one another. The past century has witnessed the emancipation of the slave, the organization of many forms of relief for the poor, the maimed and the afflicted, surely the proclamation of this infallible remedy for the worst kind of ill must not be suffered to flag. Every man on earth ought to know of it. Every one who has experienced its power ought to be ready to testify (which is the best form of preaching) to what it has done for him. And to the heathen, the millions in India, China, Africa and South America, who have never heard of it, we ought to show our readiness to preach by providing the funds to support the men who are waiting to carry the good news to the uttermost parts of the earth. In that cause every dollar contributed is a preacher, for how can the men go except they be sent?

Colorado Colored Children's Home

A BRANCH of the Steele Home for Needy Children, Chattanooga, Tenn., will be opened in Colorado by March, according to the plans of Mrs. Steele, founder of the institution. The manner in which the Tennessee home has triumphed over difficulties augurs success for the new enterprise. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are familiar with the story of Mrs. Steele's sixteen years of labor and sacrifice for the orphan waifs and strays of Chattanooga's negro population. They know of the excellent results which have crowned her efforts, and of the high regard in which the Home's child-saving work is held by the best people of both races in the city which has experienced its benefits, and her present undertaking will command their hearty sympathy. Taking vagrant children off the streets and bringing them up as wage-earning citizens is a national as well as a municipal benefaction. In a letter to this journal, Mrs. Steele thus states her reason for establishing a branch of her work in Colorado.

Many of our children have consumption; others show tendency to develop this scourge, to which the negro race seems peculiarly subject. The climate of Colorado is desirable because of its beneficial effect upon lung troubles. Besides, our orphans, as they grow up, can do better out there, financially and socially and intellectually, than here. We need a house and lot with accommodations for fifty children, and I wish some one in Colorado would give us the use of such a place for a term of years. The railroads have been generous to us heretofore; the late President Huntington, of the Southern Pacific, was particularly kind in giving us passes. If some one will help us secure the home, I think the roads can be counted upon to aid us in the matter of transportation.

A New Religious Assembly

Great gatherings for religious development like those at Ocean Grove, N. J., and Northfield, Mass., have exerted so widespread and beneficent an influence that their multiplication and extension are likely to be among the characteristics of the coming years. The latest example of the kind is the movement just inaugurated by the Church of the Disciples. A syndicate of capitalists belonging to that church has recently acquired a tract of land, comprising about a thousand acres, in Delaware, fronting on the Atlantic Ocean, between Dagsboro Bay and Indian River. It is proposed to build a large Auditorium there, and to encourage members of the Disciples' Church to purchase sites and build cottages for summer occupation. Arrangements have been made by the syndicate to construct a branch line of railroad from the main line to the Assembly's ground, and during the summer to run frequent trains. The new encampment is to be called Bethany Beach, and it is expected that it will be formally dedicated on July 4th of this year. The programme includes: Systematic Bible Study, Sunday School Conferences, Christian Endeavor Conventions, Temperance Entertainments, Women's Work, and Conferences on Social Reform and the betterment of social conditions.

Parsee Gratitude

The Indian Spectator, the leading Parsee organ in Calcutta, declares that the sympathy and intelligence with which missionaries entered into the work of famine relief has been a revelation to them all. The assistance from America is again and again gratefully referred to.

8. Address all communications intended for this department. Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions Will be Answered Feb. 20

1. In what sense must Paul's reference to the church as the pillar and ground of the truth (I. Timothy 3: 15) be understood?
2. Can two nations, both claiming to be Christians, go to war, one with the other, and still continue in Christ fellowship?
3. In view of the prohibition of the Christian marrying an unbeliever, would it be the duty of a man who had been converted to break an engagement to marry a worldly girl which he had made prior to his conversion?
4. What is the origin of druggists' colored bottles for signs?
5. If a Christian discovers that a company in which he holds shares is insolvent and on the verge of failure, is he justified in selling his shares?

Questions of the Week

1. Can a man be a sincere Christian and belong to a trust or monopoly?

A trust or monopoly is usually a selfish, organized combination. It is in most instances a scheme to obtain and hold a monopoly of a certain article, in order to be able to sell that article above its legitimate price. Any man who takes part in such a scheme is acting a part that is contrary both to the letter and the spirit of Christianity. He may not know it; his conscience may be asleep; the greed of gain may have blinded him; but, none the less, he is acting contrary to the mind of Christ. This, however, is not pronouncing on the man's character as a whole. We can imagine it possible that he may be a Christian, notwithstanding. It is God's province alone to judge. All we can say is, that the man is acting an inconsistent, unworthy, and dangerous part.

But now, to be quite fair, I believe there are a few monopolies that are justifiable and right. I know of two that were lately formed, in which the object was not to overcharge, but simply to make business run more smoothly, and to secure a legitimate profit. In the cases referred to there was such competition in prices and terms between rivals that profits were uncertain, unsteady, and often nil. It came to be seen at length that an honorable agreement among the competitors that would leave a legitimate profit, and nothing more, would operate in bringing about a better understanding, and also reduce expenses. Such a combine, I think, is wise and right. Only the parties in such a combine need to be on their guard lest the power they have acquired do not foster a desire for profits that are more than legitimate and fair. The Golden Rule should rule.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

A trust is a combination formed for the purpose of destroying competition and increasing profits. The profits are increased either by advancing the price to the consumer without allowing the labor employed in production to participate in the advance, or by lessening the cost of production—which means a reduction of the wages of the employees, or a discharge of a portion of them—without reducing the selling price to the consumer. As the producer is often the consumer also, any increase in the difference between the labor cost and selling price of the article produced means a curtailment of the comforts, if not the necessities of life, to the family of the laborer. Any increase in the selling price of a product without a corresponding increase in the wages of the producers certainly is dishonest; and no sincere Christian will be a party to the robbery of either the wage-earner or the general public.

On the other hand, a monopoly such as a gas company, which supplies the light for a city, may be conducted under such restrictions and by men of such character as to be entirely fair to the laborer, the capitalist, and the public. In such a monopoly the Christian can very properly invest his savings. If, however, the monopoly has been secured by unjust methods, and is run on the principle of the trust, the Christian should let it alone. Capital, labor, and the consumer are honestly entitled to equal chances; and the Christian should satisfy himself that this condition will be met before he embarks in any enterprise.

F. A. BROWN.

2. Can the argument that a Christian is a citizen of heaven, and therefore ought not to mingle in the politics of this world to any extent, be supported from the Bible?

The Bible teaches that this life is a warfare with sin; that man is not to withdraw from one's view of life will be much more inspiring if he educate himself to see heaven a realization of this life; i. e., heaven begins not in "The happy, happy land, far, far away," but in this old sin-cursed earth. A much more helpful view is "Only let your citizenship be as it becometh the Gospel of Christ" (Phil. 1: 27, R. V.). That society should be organized into the State, is as much God's plan for the salvation of the race as that the followers of Jesus should be formed into a Church. A man cannot serve God at church and the devil in the State, nor can he be silent at seeing such. All work is sacred, and a man may be just as true a Christian in his shirt sleeves, as when at church—when he casts his ballot, as when he sits at the Lord's table. CLYO JACKSON.

3. Is the phrase "a broken heart" wholly figurative?

Yes. The heart is one of the most wonderful organs in the human being, possessing its own circulatory system, its power to do tremendous physical feats, but yet a most responsive and obedient member. Its movements are subject to and controlled by the nervous system, there being acceleratory and inhibitory nerves, each to serve as the name sig-

But there is what has been considered reliable testimony that there have been cases in which the breaking of the heart took place. It is also said (See Fowler's Creative Science) that a dove once dropped dead by the side of the cage of its imprisoned mate, and when examined its heart was found to be actually burst open. So, the phrase, though usually figurative, is not wholly so. C. P. A.

4. Can a modern church succeed without music?

Not very well. Music is, we might say, the life of almost any church. Take a church having little music, or where the singing is poor, or where the singers are listless and indifferent, and you will find such a church about "dead" spiritually. Lively singing of hymns, with earnestness, by Christian people has an influence which cannot be estimated. Eternity only can reveal what has been accomplished by good music in our churches and missions. God only can reward those who have consecrated their voices to him in song. Hearts have been touched and melted, and many a wanderer has been led to Christ and to a better and purer life through the instrumentality of song. Sing and sing thoughtfully and prayerfully, and blessings will surely follow. HOMER A. SEIP.

A LITTLE HINDU PRAYER

ONE of our Christian missionaries in India has sent us this beautiful photograph of three little native famine orphans, belonging to the great army of helpless waifs who are now being cared for by the generous readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These little brown-skinned maids have just finished their meal, and are returning thanks in the simple way they have been taught by the good missionaries. This is their "grace after meat," the translation of which has been made by the Rev. T. E. Inglis, of Yonkers, N. Y., who lived and worked for Christ in India many years:

KHURAK KA SHUKR — "RETURNING THANKS"

From a far country to us art sending.

society and live a hermit life, but is to act and to make his actions effective for the betterment of his neighbor. He must not be a mere dreamer and theorist, but must "practice what he preaches" by taking an active part in any movement that may come in his way for the purification of society and government. If politics and the government are corrupt, it is because the Christian has allowed them to become so, and it is his duty to go to work and think and talk and vote as well as pray for purer politics. The Christian can show his religious faith by supporting for office Christian men, who are nominated by Christians on a Christian platform. The American citizen who evades this duty on any such pretext is too cowardly to be even a fair Christian. F. A. BROWN.

I do not think so. "Come out from among them and be ye separate" (II. Cor. 6: 17), might seem to support the idea; but Christ's manner of life in contrast with that of John the Baptist, has proven conclusively that the highest type of man does not shut himself off from the rest of the world; that man develops his highest nature by living for others. Then, too, "Our citizenship is in heaven" (Phil. 3: 20, R. V.), appears to carry the same idea. But nifies, and in a most intimate relation we find, also, the sympathetic nervous system, through which each organ responds to the supreme power, the brain. Sudden joy affects, pre-eminently, the acceleratory nerves—the "flood gates" are opened and we have the flushed face. Sudden fear affects the inhibitory nerves—the circulation is checked and we have the blanched face. These serve to illustrate how the deep sorrow, pain and loss so affect the inhibitory or depressor nerves that the heart is robbed of its own life-giving force, and the man or woman is said to die of "a broken heart."

C. E. ENLOW.

The phrase is usually figurative, because the strain of great emotion is felt sensibly in the region of the heart, and thereby the heart came to be identified with the emotions. But it has been found in some instances that under the strain of great grief or emotions of great intensity, that there has been an actual rupture, either of the heart or its immediate connections. It is a somewhat widely published theory that Christ on the cross actually suffered the breaking of the heart, and in that way his speedy death is explained. That seems a fanciful and profane suggestion.

It is not always so sure that it contributes to the real success of a church in its proper ends. The proper purpose of music is to aid the heart in worship and be the real expression of praise, prayer and adoration. But it often does none of these, but only attracts the crowd and gives a sensuous pleasure. In such a case it rather hinders than aids any real spiritual results. But whether church music is a success or not, may there not be used other features of a service which shall be sufficient to be the vehicle of the worship of the congregation? I think it quite possible. It can be so arranged by the minister and congregation that the praise of the Lord may be voiced otherwise than in music. Every act of every one in the service may be so direct and unartificial that even added power might be the result. C. P. ATKINSON.

5. How should a person proceed who having no church affiliation desires to engage in humanitarian work?

Such a one through the officers of some of the existing charitable societies may distribute means for the first year. In the meantime, through investigation through persons who come in contact with the poor, he may become acquainted with the neediest. By diligent attention to the subject he may find a way to benefit the greatest number. He ought to be able at least in a year to direct his own charitable benevolence. E. HIBBERD.

There are many ways in which he can do this. Let him watch the newspapers and promptly relieve cases of genuine distress. Let him visit the police courts, the hospitals and similar places, and he will hear such stories of suffering and misfortune as will arouse his warmest sympathies. Let him inquire of any physician in a poor district, or of any grocer or milkman and he will not fail to be directed to homes of penury and sore need. Let him observe the grim procession at the door of the pawnshop, the wan-faced children who stare hungrily in at the windows of the baker or butcher. Let him note and follow up any one of the hundred infallible signs of distress that may be found in almost any neighborhood, city or rural, and he will be led to the place where he can serve his Master best by serving humanity. A blessing goes with such service. Besides, it has the distinct advantage of bringing the worker into personal contact with the work, which he sees with his own eyes and not through those of others. THE BULLET-RIDDLED FRENCH LEGATION

Ruin Wrought in the Ancient Chinese Capital

PEKING SINCE THE SIEGE

A Sad Spectacle of the Dreadful
Horrors of War

WAR'S desolations are well illustrated in the city of Peking. One who had visited the city before the outbreak, but who has not been there since, would find it impossible to realize the widespread destruction that has taken place. Only the legations that were within the lines of defense during the siege, and the North Roman Catholic Cathedral, now remain to show that the "barbarians from over the sea" had ever polluted the sacred city with edifices of foreign pattern. Other legations, outside those lines, together with the mission homes, churches, foreign stores, and multitudes of Chinese buildings, furnished fuel for one of the greatest conflagrations the world has ever witnessed. Even the shops and homes of those who had been employed by foreigners, or had had business relations with them, were given to the flames.

Long before the outbreak the Boxers boasted that they could set fire to buildings by merely making passes with the and. Their fanatical fury did not abate even when the flames repeatedly spread to buildings belonging to anti-foreign Chinese, and consumed millions upon millions' worth of property. Government buildings, and the most "sacred structures," such as the Imperial Library and the Chien gate in front of the palace, were consumed.

The largest group of buildings belonging to any single mission was that of the Methodists. They had the finest Protestant church edifice in North China, and in the same enclosure were six comfortable dwelling houses, a hospital, dispensary, and buildings connected with the university and the Industrial Department.

In this place most of the missionaries in Peking and vicinity had gathered for safety, and here fortifications were prepared. Trenches were dug, barricades erected, barbed wire stretched in various places, and the church was converted into a fort for self-defense. Twenty marines, together with ten or twelve volunteers from among the missionaries, and some of the native Christians, the latter armed with spears and swords, could have held the place against the Boxers alone. But it would have been madness to have attempted to hold the mission compound with such feeble forces against the Boxers and the Chinese Imperial troops combined. On the day the position was abandoned, the buildings were looted and fired. Now all that remains is one lone tree and a piece of wall, both of which show the marks of fire. These stand sentinel over the barren waste where there was formerly so much activity on the lines of Christian education and industry.

Just across the street was the Ladies' Mission compound, a large dwelling house, a girls' boarding-school for over a hundred pupils, and a hospital and dispensary for women and children. This place was guarded and held until the abandonment of the Mission. In fortifying it the Chinese schoolgirls and women assisted the defenders by carrying bricks. One night a great mob assembled outside the wall which separates the northern city from the southern. The howling of the raging mob was distinctly heard, and the cry "kill! kill!" could be distinguished. No one knew whether the city gate would be opened to admit the crowd or not, so it was thought prudent to conduct the schoolgirls and the women from the Ladies' Mission to the church across the street, which was better fortified. With lurid flames all around, and a howling mob outside the city wall, the transfer was made in a quiet and orderly manner. One of the marines remarked admiringly: "When the Mission Boards appointed those ladies they knew what they were about." Only portions of walls belonging to outbuildings are now standing.

The central gate between the northern and southern cities, the chien or front gate, is the chief gate of Peking, being directly in front of the palace. It has three gateways. The common people are permitted to pass through the two side gates; the central one opens only for royalty. After the arrival of the relief forces, Mr. Squires, secretary of the American legation, led a party along the wall to this front gate, went down and unlocked it, and let the cannon of the allied forces in. Afterward the gate was blown down, and now the poorest coolie can freely tread where only monarchs trod before. It is said the key, about two feet long, is to be sent to the Smithsonian Institute. The inner tower was burned after the allied forces arrived. The fire took place in the night and formed one of the grandest sights conceivable.

Legation street runs nearly parallel with the wall between the northern and southern cities and not much more than a bowshot from it. Of the buildings along this street, those within the lines of defense were not utterly destroyed, although often struck by shot and shell; but outside the lines the fires left little but blackened walls. These ruins include the Netherlands legation.

The French legation is badly pitted by bullets and riddled by shot and shell. The heavy chains connecting the stone pillars in front of the gateway were offensive to the Chinese and have been carried off. This legation was partially destroyed by the double explosion of a Chinese mine. The Chinese succeeded in gaining nearly half of the Legation, but lost many men.

It is remarkable that only sixty-five of the defenders were killed during the siege. Of these some were buried in a little plot of ground in the south end of the Legation. Soldier and civilian, Catholic and Protestant, the strong man and the little child, were laid to rest here. Some lie two in one grave, as in the case of Captain Strouts of the British marines, and Mr. Warren, a student at the Legation, who were killed about the same time.

Once, when a lowly bed was being prepared, a passer-by said, "Let me take the spade," but the reply was "No, he is my brother; we fought together on the wall." They were from different lands, but their common interest made them kin.

A Chinese youth, with hands blistered and sore, refused aid in the work which was so new to him, saying, "No matter about my hands, it is my heart that hurts, to think that those who came here to save us should be so treated by my own people." Such incidents show the universal brotherhood of man.

PANORAMA OF ELLIS ISLAND, VIEWED FROM THE HARBOR OF NEW YORK, SHOWING THE NEW IMMIGRATION BUILDINGS

The · Gateway · to · the · New · World

Rejuvenated Ellis Island, New York, Now the Finest Immigrant Station on the Globe—The Human Influx Unabated

WITH the completion of new buildings costing $1,500,000 on Ellis Island, in the harbor of New York, future citizens of the United States, to the number of 7,000 a day, can now be cared for. Further improvements to cost another $1,500,000, are now under way, and when these are finished, Ellis Island will be the model Immigration Station of the world. When the United States Bureau of Immigration took formal possession of the new buildings, Hon. Lyman J. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury, addressing the commissioners, said:

"The immigration movement has tended steadily westward, and we may believe it will continue until it circles the globe, the West becomes the East again and migration returns upon itself in the ancient home of the nations. On its way it finds us a halfway station. We welcome the worthy emigrant who comes here with the hope of improving his condition and with the purpose of becoming a good American citizen. This station is his gateway to the new world, and it is of no little importance that his first impression of us is favorable. The spirit of patience, consideration and kindness toward him should be the inexorable rule of your conduct. A stranger to our language, he here crosses the threshold of a new and untried life. He is entitled to sympathy and goodwill. Through this humble door have come many who, under the spirit of our instruction and under the protection of our laws, have achieved prosperity and happiness, and they in turn have contributed to the protection, the honor and the greatness of our land."

During the last year of the century it is estimated that the immigration reached 450,000. Of this total less than 4,000, or below one per cent., hailed from the tropics. The number of immigrants from the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines was less than 250. Immigration statistics show a great variety of races landing at American ports. Vast numbers of Russian and Polish Hebrews cross the Atlantic to become citizens of Freedom's Land, while Danes, Swedes, Hungarians, French, Cubans, Spaniards, Arabs, Syrians and Armenians pour in every year. Many come to avoid political and religious persecution.

The buildings on Ellis Island still incomplete are the bath-house, restaurant, coffee, pies and fruit can be purchased by the hungry. The bill of fare, together with the price of every article of food, is printed in different languages and posted conspicuously in the restaurant. Should any immigrant be unable to buy a meal, food is supplied gratuitously, the contractor getting his pay from the steamship company which brought the poverty-stricken wanderer over sea. The board bills of any immigrant debarred from

There are two cots in each tier, and sleeping accommodations are provided for about one thousand people.

There is a provision in the laws which provides that every immigrant must have at least thirty dollars in his possession upon his arrival, but immigrants who do not possess the requisite amount are leniently dealt with, and, in a majority of cases, are allowed to depart for their prospective homes. If a well-dressed, intelligent-looking man—say a civil engineer—comes to America in search of fortune, as an immigrant, he will be detained and sent back to his home country if it is found that he has not the required thirty dollars. On the other hand, if a laborer is found not to possess the needed sum, he may be permitted to land, the reason being that he is less likely to become a charge upon the public than his better educated fellow-worker.

From six to ten missionaries will be stationed on the island to attend to the spiritual wants of the immigrants. These spiritual workers represent many Christian denominations. They are provided with desks and cabinets for their correspondence and printed matter, and one of the largest and most commodious rooms in the building has been set apart for their exclusive use. Though the time in which the missionaries have to labor is short, the immigrants are greatly benefited by their counsels, as well as by the tracts and Bibles handed them. By the distribution of Bibles in the past, seed has been sown in good ground, and many are the grateful letters received acknowledging kindness that has been shown to total strangers.

All the immigrants are exceedingly appreciative of whatever is done in their behalf, and in many cases it is solely through the kindly interest the missionaries take in them, that strangers are assisted in finding their friends, and thus escaping the danger of being sent back to the country from which they came.

IMMIGRANTS WHO HAVE BEEN REFUSED ADMISSION TO THE COUNTRY and electric lighting and steam-heating buildings, the hospital building, the residence of the government physicians, and the building for housing disinfecting plant. The care of the immigrants is entrusted to some 200 employees, consisting of physicians, interpreters, clerks, matrons and inspectors. One of the features of the new main building is the great refreshment room, where bread, meat, tea, entry must be paid by the steamship company on whose line he came to this country, at the rate of thirty-five cents a day.

On the upper floor of the immigration building there are many tiers of iron cots with woven wire springs, provided for immigrants that are detained for special inquiry, or because of failure to meet the requirements of the immigration laws.

A NEW CENTURY CRUSADE

MOVEMENT to remove the two chief obstacles to missionary progress, the traffics in opium and liquors among uncivilized races, initiated at the Ecumenical Missionary Conference last spring, has already won encouraging victories in Congress, and promises to be the most characteristic humane and Christian achievement of the opening years of the new century.

In 1890 seventeen nations (including Zanzibar, since swallowed up by Great Britain) made a treaty to suppress in the then newly opened Congo country the traffics in slaves, firearms and spirituous liquors. Our own country, we blush to say, was the last save Portugal to ratify, but finally adopted this new policy of civilization. In 1899 the chief nations of the world again met by delegates to supplement the former treaty as to the one matter of intoxicants only. It was an official temperance convention, and as such the most significant and encouraging temperance convention ever held, although it did not prohibit the sale of all intoxicants even to native races. It stopped short of what the United States delegates and some others urged and only raised the tax from ten to fifty-two cents a gallon, which was considered prohibitive for the natives in their great poverty. Whether adequate or not it is a step in the right direction and the treaty has been ratified, as the writer learned through a letter from the Department of Foreign Affairs of the Congo Free State, by every first-class nation except ours. It applies to all of Africa from 20 degrees north latitude (above which lie a tier of Mohammedan countries in which the natives are protected by their total abstinence religions) to 22 degrees south latitude, below which the natives are protected by Great Britain's new policy of prohibition for native races, adopted in the name of conscience and commerce.

On the opening day of Congress the President, in his message, recommended the ratification of the treaty and the universal application of the policy it contains to uncivilized races everywhere.

This recommendation, due in part to the public discussion of the subject inaugurated at the Ecumenical Missionary Conference and promoted by the Reform Bureau in lectures and literature, was followed up by the same organization in four hearings before committees of Congress during the first week of its December session. After the first of these, the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs voted to report in favor of ratifying the treaty. Senator Lodge also introduced the following resolution, which is in effect an invitation to all nations to complete the work these treaties have begun:

Resolved, that in the opinion of this body the time has come when the principle twice affirmed in international treaties for Central Africa, that native races should be protected against the destructive traffics in intoxicants, should be extended to all uncivilized peoples, by the enactment of such laws and the making of such treaties as will effectually prohibit the sale to aboriginal tribes and uncivilized races of firearms, opium and intoxicating beverages.

For such a century opening, telegraphic petitions were sent by Bishop E. G. Andrews and Secretaries Carroll, Morgan, Moorehouse, Ellinwood, Speer, Cobb and Lloyd of the great missionary boards of the Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, Presbyterian, Reformed (Dutch) and Episcopal Churches.

The following was sent by other petitioners as a memorial to the House.

Undersigned respectfully memorialize your honorable body to signalize the opening of the twentieth Christian century by making it the first act of the House of Representatives to pass the Gillett bill for the protection of uncivilized races against firearms, opium and intoxicants, in the New Hebrides and other Pacific islands which are not under civilized governments, as a step toward the world-wide application of this new policy of civilization which is recommended in the President's message.

On Jan. 4th, the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs ordered a favorable report on the Lodge resolution. It was passed by the Senate unanimously. This insures the passage in the Senate of the Gillett New Hebrides bill, if the people urge it by petitions, letters and telegrams.

Progress at the Pan-American Exposition

THE PLAZA

THE directors promise one virtue for the Pan American Exposition that can be ascribed to no fair that has been—everything will be ready for the opening. They are also pledged that the fair shall transcend all former enterprises of this kind in a number of important features, among which electrical, fountain, floral and color effects, original sculptural ornamentation, and court settings.

It is even predicted that the beautiful "White City" of 1893 shall be surpassed in point of artistic enchantment by the "Rainbow City," as the electrical wonderland which Buffalo has been bringing into existence in her northern suburbs since 1899 is well named. Ornate architecture, gorgeous color scheme, in which red roofs and tinted walls play a part, extensive rose gardens, and thousands of gay plants, will contribute to a result which shall be as characteristic of tropical America as the section in which the Exposition is held. The Rainbow City will be encircled by a solid wall of green foliage. Its lagoons, fountains, Court of Lilies and Court of Founfalo, Canada is showing peculiar interest in the fair; and, of course, New York's sister States, from Maine to the Gulf and to California, are preparing to put their wares and products in competitive display.

In March, 1899, Congress appropriated $500,000 for a Government exhibit. The three large buildings, nearing completion, will house displays of unusual interest and significance; the machinery of all depart-

Departments have never been able to make such an exhibit as at present. The Departments of Justice and of Labor will provide funds of information, so arranged that the sociologist can acquire at a glance what it would take a lifetime to learn by slower processes. An exhibit which will attract much attention is that of the Bureau of American Republics,

Mines and metallurgy, machinery and arena than that of the great Roman Colosseum; work is going forward rapidly on it. Not only is this to be a field for athletic sports, but it will afford space for exhibits of automobiles, agricultural and road machinery, live stock, etc. Two buildings are to be permanent, one the Albright Art Gallery, gift of Mr. J. J. Albright; the other, the New York State Building. Both of these are in white marble. When it was found that the Art Gallery would not be completed by May 1—perhaps the only building projected of which this doubt was entertained—the directors straightway ordered the erection of a temporary structure as a repository for art treasures, whose display will not, therefore, be delayed. A number of buildings are practically ready now; and the electric lights have been turned on in some of the great and goodly halls just to give admiring companies of distinguished visitors a hint of what a very fine show in the way of illumination Buffalo holds in store for the thousands who will be her guests next summer. The grounds display the same marvelous progress in preparation as the buildings. Much effort is being made to ments will be like a chapter from fairyland, especially at night, when electric rainbows, fountains, and parti-colored sprays bloom over waterways and buildings. The electric tower, 375 feet high, crowned with a superb figure representing the Goddess of Light, is the centrepiece, dominating the entire Exposition.

No Exposition has been so thoroughly representative of the two Americas as this will be. Nearly every Central and South American country has been arranged for exhibits. Cuba, the Philippines, Hawaii, and Porto Rico will be brought before our observation as they have not been hitherto. Years of travel and study could not afford such an education in American history, such knowledge of American resources, vegetable and mineral, so through an acquaintance with the industries and such a comprehensive view of the various peoples of the western hemisphere, as will be afforded by a week's sojourn in Buffalo this summer. Coming directly after the International Exposition at Paris, the Pan-American Exposition has an unusual advantage over preceding fairs, in that so many exhibits were ready for installation, all that was necessary being transferred from the one city to the other. As a natural result of geographical nearness to Buf-

ments of our Government are illustrated as they could be in no other way. The Post-Office Department alone covers 5,000 square feet of space—larger territory than was ever before devoted to this department at an Exposition. The Department of State shows how we conduct diplomatic work and certain domestic affairs; the Treasury Department display will exceed in point of instructive interest anything ever presented before. The War and Navy transportation, forestry, fisheries, horticulture, sanitation, manufactures, liberal and graphic arts, are all finding homes in noble and appropriate buildings, where the American, thirsty for knowledge, may come and drink his fill while he takes a summer vacation. The Temple of Music and the Midway, the boats on the lakes, and trips to Niagara will furnish amusement more than enough. The Stadium, covering ten acres of ground, has a larger perfect Ethnological departments, and the opportunity, in the Six Nations' Exhibit, to see the Red Man as he lived, hunted and celebrated his pagan festivals four hundred years ago, is alone worth a visit to the Fair. As much might be said for the Mexican exhibit, with its peep into ancient Aztec life and its panorama of modern progress.

Buffalo is profiting by the mistakes and successes of former fairs in planning this.

In handling and housing crowds, exceptional facilities are being provided. The promoters and officers of this great enterprise are thorough business men, and nothing that can enhance the interest, value and attractiveness of the Exposition will be overlooked. The Director-General, Hon. Wm. J. Buchanan, was a National Commissioner, a Chief of Department at the World's Fair, and a recognized force and sagacious adviser in its general management. He resigned the office of Minister to the Argentine Republic to assume his present responsibilities. During the six months which the Exposition will last, more important conventions will be held in Buffalo than ever gathered in any other one place on this side of the Atlantic in the course of a decade. One will be the Pan-American Bible Study Congress, July 17-31.

THE · DOOR · OPEN · TO · ALL

A Sermon by REV. T. DEWITT TALMAGE, D.D.
Preached in the ACADEMY OF MUSIC, NEW YORK

TEXT: John 10: 16: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

HERE is no monopoly in religion. The grace of God is not a little property, that we may fence off and have all to ourselves. It is not a king's park, at which we look through a barred gateway, wishing that we might go in and see the statuary and the deer and the royal conservatory. No; it is a Father's orchard, and everywhere there are bars that we may let down and gates that we may swing open.

In my boyhood, next to the country schoolhouse, there was an orchard of apples, owned by a very lame man, who, although there were apples in the place perpetually decaying, and by scores and scores of bushels, never would allow any of us to touch the fruit. Sometimes the lads of the school, in the sinfulness of a nature inherited from our first parents, who were ruined by the same temptation, invaded that orchard; but they soon retreated, for the man came after them at a speed reckless of making his lameness worse, and cried out, "Boys, drop those apples, or I will set the dog on you."

Well, my friends, there are Christian men who have the church under severe guard. There is fruit in this orchard for the whole world, but they have a rough and unsympathetic way of accosting outsiders, as though they had no business there, though the Lord wants all to come and take the choicest and the ripest fruit on the premises. Have you an idea that because you were baptized at eight months of age, and because you have all your life been under hallowed influences, you therefore have a right to one whole side of the Lord's table, spreading yourself out and taking up the entire room? I tell you, no. You will have to haul in your elbows, for we will place on either side of you those whom you never expected would sit there; for, as Christ said to his people long ago, so he says to you and to me, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

Many Folds

McDonald, the Scotchman, has thousands of head of sheep. Some of them are browsing on the heather, some of them are lying down under the trees, some are strolling over the mountains, some of them are in his yard. They are scattered all around in many places. Cameron, his neighbor, comes over and says, "I see you have thirty-six sheep. I have just counted them." "No," says McDonald, "I have a great many more sheep than you found in this yard. Some are here, and some are elsewhere. I have four or five thousand in my flocks. 'Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold.'" So Christ says to us. Here is a knot of Christians, and there a knot of Christians, but they make up a small part of the flock. Here is the Episcopal fold, the Methodist fold, the Lutheran fold, the Congregational fold, the Presbyterian fold, the Baptist and the Pedo-Baptist fold, the only difference between these last two being the way in which they wash the sheep, and so they are scattered all over. And we come with our statistics and say there are so many thousand of the Lord's sheep, but Christ responds, "No, no; you have not seen more than one out of a thousand of my flock. They are scattered all over the earth. 'Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold.'"

Of all the merciful institutions which bless this city, not one more thoroughly enters into the spirit of the text than does the Bowery Mission, whose twentieth anniversary we to-day celebrate. During the past year 3,000 souls have been saved through its instrumentality, and during its existence it has put its temporal and spiritual benediction upon hundreds of thousands of the poor and suffering and lost. With the bread of this life in one hand, and the bread of eternal life in the other, it is doing a stupendous work, and to all of its patrons Christ is saying: "I was hungry, and ye fed me, naked, and ye clothed me, sick and in prison, and ye visited me. Inasmuch as ye did it unto me, one of the least of these, ye did it to me." It is through this Gospel that New York is to be taken for God, and America for God, and the world for God. There are two classes of hearers in this audience whom I especially address, the friends of this institution who have come out to show their interest in the work, and the other class is made up of those who are astray, but want to get back, have fallen, but want to rise.

A Wide Field

We need, as churches, to get into sympathy with the great outside world, and let them know that none are so broken-hearted or hard beset that they will not be welcomed. "No," says some fastidious Christian, "I do not like to be crowded in church. Do not put any one in my pew." My brother, what will you do in heaven, when a great multitude that no man can number assembles? They will put fifty in your pew. What are the people assembled in Christian churches compared with the mightier millions outside? Some churches are like a hospital, that should advertise that its patients must have nothing worse than toothache or run-rounds, but no broken heads, no crushed ankles, or fractured limbs. Bring there for treatment moderate sinners, velvet-coated sinners, and sinners with a gloss on. It is as if a man had a farm of three thousand acres, and put all his work on one acre. He might raise never so large ears of corn, never so big heads of wheat, still he would remain poor. The Church of God has bestowed its chief care on one acre, and has raised splendid men and women in that small inclosure. But the field is the world. That means Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, and all the islands of the sea.

It is as though at a great battle there were left ten thousand wounded and dying on the field, and three surgeons gave all their time to a half dozen patients in a barn hospital. The major-general comes in and says to the doctors: "Come out here and look at the ten thousand dying for lack of surgical attendance." "No," say the three doctors standing there fanning their patients, "we have a half dozen important cases here, and we are attending to them, and when we are not positively busy with their wounds, it takes all our time to keep the flies off." In this awful battle of sin and sorrow, where millions have fallen on millions, do not let us spend all our time in taking care of a few people, and when the command comes, "Go into the world," say practically, "No, I cannot go; I have here a few choice cases, and I am busy keeping off the flies." We need, as churches, to stop bombarding the old iron-clad sinners that have been proof against thirty years of Christian assault, and take aim in other directions.

Chilling Exclusiveness

Years ago I visited a New England factory village. I went up to the door of a factory, and I saw on the outside the words "No admittance." Of course, I went in, and coming to the second door, I saw the words "No admittance." Getting clear on into the factory, I saw they were making pins, useful pins, and nothing but pins. So I think there is sometimes an exclusiveness among some of the churches. The outside world comes up and looks at the door, and there is something which seems to say "No admittance;" and the world comes up to the pew door, and sees written over it, "No admittance;" and looks at the pulpit, and there is something there which seems to say "No admittance," while we stand inside of the same churches hammering out our little niceties of religious belief, making pins. Oh! for deeper appreciation of the sentiment of my text: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

I have to remark that the heavenly Shepherd will find many sheep amid the non-church-goers. There are congregations where they are all Christians, and they seem to be completely finished, and they remind one of the skeleton leaves, which by chemical preparation have had all the greenness and verdure taken off them and are left cold and white and delicate, nothing wanting but a glass case to put over them. The minister of Christ has nothing to do with such Christians but to come once a week, and with ostrich feather dust off the accumulation of the last six days, leaving them bright and crystalline as before. But the other kind of church is an armory, with perpetual sound of drum and fife, gathering recruits for the Lord of Hosts, and saying to every applicant: "Do you want to be on God's side, the safe side, and the happy side? If so, come in the armory and

Get Equipped

Here is a bath in which to be cleansed. Here are sandals to put upon your feet. Here is a helmet for your brow. Here is a breastplate for your heart. Here is a sword for your right arm, and yonder is the battlefield. Quit yourselves like men."

There may be some here who say, "I stopped going to church ten or twenty years ago." Is it not strange that you are among the first that I address to-day? I know all your case. You have not been accustomed to going into the house of God, but I have a surprising announcement to make to you. You are going to become one of the Lord's sheep. "Oh!" you say, "it is impossible. You do not know how far I am from anything of that kind." I know all about it. I have wandered up and down the world, and I understand your case. I have a still more startling announcement to make in regard to you. You are not only going to become one of the Lord's sheep, but you will become one now.

When the steamer Atlantic struck Mars' Rock, and the people clambered upon the beach, why did not Mr. Ancient, that heroic minister of the Gospel, of whom we have all read, sit down and take care of those men on the beach, wrapping them in flannels, kindling fire for them, and seeing that they got plenty of food? Ah! he knew that there were others who would do that. He says: "Yonder are men and women freezing in the rigging of that wreck."

"Launch the Lifeboat"

The oar-blades bend under the strong pull, but before they reach the wreck a woman was frozen and dead. She was washed off, poor thing. "But," he says, "there is a man to save." And he cries out, "Five minutes longer, and I will save you. Steady! Steady! Give me your hand. Leap into the lifeboat. Thank God, he is saved!" So there are those who are safe on the shore of God's mercy. They are as safe as though they had been a thousand years in heaven, "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." But there are some who are freezing in the rigging of sin, and surrounded by tempest. Pull away, my lads! Let us reach them. Alas! one is washed off, and gone. There is one more to be saved. Let us push out there for that one. Clutch the rope, O dying man; clutch it as with a death-grip. Steady, now, on the slippery places! Steady! They are saved! saved! just as I thought, for Christ has declared that there are some still in the breakers who shall come ashore. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

Christ says that ministers of the Gospel are to be fishers for men. Now, when I go fishing I do not want to fish in anybody else's pond. I do not want to go along Hohokus Creek, where there are half a dozen men fishing, and drop my line just about where they drop their lines. The lines would get tangled. I should like to get in a Newfoundland fishing smack, and push out to sea fifty miles beyond the breakers. I do not think the Church of God gains a great deal when you take sheep from one fold and put them in another fold, and yet you and I have sometimes seen pastors fishing in other people's ponds. They throw a line into one pond, and they jerk out a Methodist; they throw a line into another pond and they jerk out a Presbyterian; or there is a religious row in some neighboring church, and a whole school of fish swims off from that pond, and with one sweep of the net. What is gained? Absolutely nothing for the cause of Christ. It is the lost sheep on the mountains that you want to bring back—the lost sheep on the mountains. And they are coming now. You are this hour in the tide of Christian influences. Your voice will yet be heard in public prayer. You will die in peace, your bed surrounded by Christian sympathies, and you will be carried out by devout men to the burial, and over your grave will be chiseled the words: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints," and on resurrection day you will get up with the dear children you have already buried, and with your Christian parents who have already won the palm. And all that grand and glorious history begins to-day. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

I remark again the heavenly Shepherd is going to find a great many of his sheep among those who are now rejecters of Christianity. Some of the mightiest advocates of the Gospel were once sceptics. Thomas Chalmers once a sceptic. Robert Hall a sceptic. Christmas Evans a sceptic. Charles G. Finney a sceptic. Paul the Apostle, once a sceptic. But when once with strong hand they laid hold of the Gospel chariot they rolled it on with what momentum! I do not know how you came to reject Christianity. It may have been through the infidel talk of some young man in the store or shop or factory. It may have been through the trickery of some professed Christian man, who disgusted you with religion.

Or you may have become sceptical from the fact that you grew up in a home where religion was overdone. Sunday was the most awful day in the week. You had religion driven into you with a trip-hammer. You were surfeited with prayer-meetings. You were stuffed and choked with catechisms. You were often told that you were the worst boy your parents ever knew, because you liked to ride down hill better than to read Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. Whenever your father and mother talked religion, they drew down the corners of their mouths and rolled up their eyes. If any one thing will send a boy to ruin sooner than another, that is it.

A Practical Test

But I do not stop now to know how you came into rejection of Christianity. You frankly tell me that you do reject it. You do not believe that Christ is a divine being, although you admit that he was a very good man. You do not believe that the Bible was inspired of God, although you think there are some fine things in it. There are fifty things that I believe that you do not believe, and yet you are an accommodating man. Everybody that knows you says that of you. If I should ask you to do a kindness for me, or if any one else should ask of you a kindness, you would do it. If, when you are ill, I should come to you with a phial of medicine and say: "This kind of medicine has cured fifty people who were just as badly off as you are; take it," and you replied, "I do not want to take it; I have no confidence in it." I would say, "Take it to oblige me," and you would say, "Well, if it will accommodate you, I will take it." Now, you have found that this world is insufficient, and you are sick of sin. I come to you with a Gospel medicine. It has cured hundreds and thousands and millions. Will you take it? "No," you say, "I have no confidence in it." Take it, then, to oblige me. I tell you of a Physician who has cured more blind eyes, and bound up more broken hearts, and healed more ghastly wounds than all the doctors since the time of Æsculapius. Be obliging, and just make the experiment. If you are not acquainted with the ordinary modes of prayer, say in substance: "O, Lord Jesus, this is a strange thing for me to do. I know nothing about the formulas of religion. These Christian people have been talking so long about what thou canst do for me, I am ready to do whatever thou commandest me. If there be any power in religion, as these people say, let me have the advantage of it." Will you not try that experiment?

Famous Believers

I do not now say there is anything in religion. Do not take my counsel, or the counsel of any clergyman, for you may dislike clergymen. Perhaps we may talk professionally. Perhaps we may be prejudiced in the matter. Perhaps our advice is not worth taking. Then take the counsel of some very respectable layman, as John Milton, the poet; as William Wilberforce, the emancipator; as Isaac Newton the astronomer; as Robert Boyle, the philosopher; as Locke, the metaphysician; as Morse, the telegrapher; as Washington, the statesman. They never preached, or pretended to preach, yet putting down one his telescope, and another his parliamentarian's scroll, and another his electrician's wire, came forth and commended the religion of Christ as the best thing for the cure of the world's woes. If you will not take the recommendation of ministers of the Gospel, take the recommendation of highly respectable laymen.

Oh, men, sceptical and struck through with unrest! I beg you come off that great Sahara Desert of doubt into the bright and luxuriant land of Gospel hope and peace. You do not want your children to come up in that scepticism. If you do not believe in anything else, you believe in love—a father's love, a mother's love, a wife's love, a child's love. Then let me tell you that God loves you more than all these together. The great heart of Christ aches to have you come in, and he looks into your eyes this moment, saying: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

Again, I remark that the heavenly Shepherd is going to find a great many of the sheep among those who have been full of evil habit. They were all cheated into sin. The spider does not say to the fly: "Come into the web where I kill insects." Oh, no. The spider says: "Dearest fly, come and take a morning walk with me on this suspension bridge of gossamer, glittering with diamonds of dew." Do not be hard on those gone astray. It makes me sad to see Christian people give up a prodigal as lost. There are those who talk as though the grace of God were a chain of forty or fifty links, and that when they had run out there was nothing left to touch a bad case. If they were hunting, and got off the track of the deer, they would look longer among the brakes and bushes for the lost game than they would look for that lost soul.

Desperate Cases

I want to tell you that God loves to take hold of a very bad case. When the church casts you off, and when the club-room casts you off, and when society casts you off, and when business associates cast you off, and when father casts you off, and when mother casts you off, and when everybody casts you off, your first cry for help will bend the eternal God clear down into the ditch of your suffering and shame. The Good Templars cannot save you, although they are a grand institution. The Sons of Temperance cannot save you, although they are mighty for good. Signing the temperance pledge cannot save you, although I believe in it. Nothing but the grace of the eternal God can save you, and that will if you will throw yourself on it.

They talk about the catacombs of Naples and the catacombs of Rome and the catacombs of Egypt, under the city, where is the dust of many generations passed on, but I tell you New York has its catacombs, and Washington its catacombs, and all our cities their catacombs. They are underground liquor dives, full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. There is no need of going into the art gallery to see in skillful sculpture that wonderful representation of a man and his sons wound round with serpents. There are families represented here to-day that are wrapped in the martyrdom of fang and scale and venom—a living Laocoon of ghastliness and horror.

The Great Burial Places

In the attempt at reformation do not put your trust in bromide of potassium or in anything that apothecaries can mix. Put your trust only in the eternal God. With some of these men it is a periodic temptation that comes every six weeks or every three months, when it seems as if the powers of darkness kindle around about your tongue the fires of the pit. It is well at such a time, as some of you do, to call on medical counsel, but your first and most importunate cry must be to God. If the fiends will drag you to the slaughter, may they do so on your knees. O God! now that the paroxysm of thirst is come again on that man, help him.

There will yet be in all our churches those whose hands so much tremble with dissipation that they can hardly hold a hymn book, and yet they will be so transformed that they will preach the Gospel, or on communion days carry around the consecrated bread, acceptable to everybody because of their holy life and their consecrated behavior. The Lord is going to save you. Your home has got to be rebuilt. Your physical health has got to be restored. Your worldly business has got to be reconstructed. The Church of God is going to rejoice over your discipleship. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

There is only one class of persons about whom I am disheartened, and they are the Gospel-hardened. They have been faithful in attendance at churches for twenty, thirty, and forty years, yet never have surrendered themselves to God. As Christ says, "Publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of heaven before them." They have resisted all the importunity of divine mercy and have gone through most powerful earthquakes of religious feeling, and they are further away from God than ever. After a while they will lie down sick, and some day it will be told that they are dead. No hope!

The Dawn of Hope

But I turn to outsiders with an expectation that thrills through me, body and soul. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold." You are not Gospel-hardened. You have not heard many sermons during the last few years. You feel the Holy Ghost this moment in your heart. You do not weep, but the tear is not far off. You sigh, and you have noticed that there is always a sigh in the wind before the rain falls. There are those here who would give anything if they could find relief in tears. They say: "Oh, my wasted life! Oh, the bitter past! Oh, the graves over which I have stumbled! Whither shall I fly? Alas, for the future! Everything is so dark, so very dark! God help me! God pity me!" Thank the Lord for that last utterance. You have begun to pray, and when a man begins to petition, that sets all heaven flying his way, and God steps in and beats back the hounds of temptation to their kennel, and round about the poor wounded soul puts the covert of his pardoning mercy. Hark! I hear something fall. What was that? It is the bars of the fence around the sheepfold. The Shepherd lets down the bars, and the hunted sheep of the mountain bound in, some of them their fleece torn with brambles, some of them their feet lamed with the dogs, but bounding in. Thank God! "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

A PHILANTHROPIST'S BUSY LIFE ENDED

WHEN Philip Danforth Armour, philanthropist and educator, packer king, millionaire, captain of industry commanding 20,000 employees, lay dying, his last thoughts were not concerned with his great possessions, his marvelous achievements, nor even with his magnificent benefactions. He turned from them all for communion with "Our Father who art in heaven," and his last words—save feeble farewells to dear ones around his bed—were those of the Lord's Prayer, the simple petition which had voiced his wants in childhood, expressing the millionaire's needs in this upmost moment. He who runs may read the lesson.

Mr. Armour was born in 1832, in Stockbridge, N. Y. His father was a farmer; his mother had been a school-teacher. The family library consisted chiefly of the Bible, Pilgrim's Progress, and a history of the United States. At seventeen, young Armour, carrying his clothes in an old knapsack, started to walk across the continent to the gold fields. In California, he showed the sort of business capacity which led to his successes, when he abandoned digging, bought a ditch to carry water to diggers and washers, and made it profitable. Now he bought the largest grain elevator in Milwaukee, and he became a member of a big pork-packing concern, and how, with his brothers, he built up the tremendous business of Armour & Co., are stirring chapters in the story of American industrial enterprise. The Armour establishment in Chicago is a city in itself, with its weather bureau receiving daily reports of the world's crops, cattle, sheep and swine; its post office, and its special telegraph wires and cables covering the globe. It feeds vast armies by contract, and its ships float on lake and ocean. Mr. Armour's pay-roll for five years has been $10,000,000 to $10,000,000 yearly. "Through the wages I disburse and the provisions I supply, I feed more people than any other man living," he once said. He was always kind to his employees.

The Armour Institute and the Armour Mission are his enduring monument. The latter, founded by his brother Joseph, has shared with the former in benefactions aggregating at least $2,500,000, and representing that Mr. P. D. Armour considered his "best investments." The Institute enrolls one thousand students yearly, and sends forth annually hundreds of poor young men and women equipped for self-support. Mr. Armour did not wish it regarded as a charity, hence, small fees are charged, but the tuition of many a deserving student has been quietly and privately paid by him. The Free Kindergarten Department has headquarters in the Mission, where one of the largest free kindergartens in the city is maintained; in addition, twenty-three free kindergartens are established in various parts of the town. The Mission Sunday School, which enrolls 1,000 children, was one of the joys of Mr. Armour's heart. It was his custom to be in regular attendance every Sunday. The Mission is unsectarian. It contains an elegant chapel and a free dispensary.

In 1892, Mr. Armour, after hearing an eloquent discourse on what right education could do for poor boys and girls, asked the speaker, the Rev. Dr. Gunsaulus, "You don't believe these ideas are practical—that they can be carried out?"

"I do. Only the man and the money are needed to put them in operation," was the reply.

"Then," said Mr. Armour, "I will supply the necessary money."

"It will take a million and more," explained the preacher.

"Give me five years of your time to put these ideas in practice, and I will give the million or more," repeated Mr. Armour.

The result is the Armour Institute, of which Dr. Gunsaulus is President. Founded only ten years ago, it ranks with the best technical institutions.

Mr. Armour was fond of his home, and it suffered no neglect because of his varied interests. He was married in 1862 to Miss Ogden. They had two children, Philip—whose death a year ago was a sorrow from which Mr. Armour never fully recovered—and Ogden, who now succeeds his father as head of the latter's enterprises. Mr. Armour suffered from the heart trouble, which led to his death, for two years. The attack which precipitated the end was brought on, it is said, by a snowballing romp with his little grandchildren. He liked to see young people happy.

Mr. Armour was once asked what he considered the quality most valuable in the affairs of life. "Truth"; was the immediate reply. Other desirable qualities were industry, system and good measure. "Give a measure heaped full and running over," he said. "That is what it means to be the intelligent servants of a great public need." Temperance and close attention to business might be added to the virtues he had practiced. He was usually at his office by eight every morning.

His great educational and philanthropic work at the institute and the affairs of the mission have been the chief objects of his solicitude for years past, and he no doubt thought more of them than of all his business triumphs. His charities were abundant. There were days when even his business lieutenants could not see him, but not one when he could not give time to any worthy cause that needed help.

Genuine Womanhood

WHAT the world wants now is about fifty thousand old-fashioned mothers, women who should realize that the highest, grandest, mightiest institution on earth is the home. It is not necessary that they should have the same old-time manners of the country farmhouse, or wear the old-fashioned cap and spectacles and apron that her glorified ancestry wore; but I mean the old spirit which began with the Hannahs and the Abigail of Scripture days, and was demonstrated on the homestead where some of us were reared, though the old house long ago was pulled down and its occupants scattered, never to meet until in the higher home that awaits the families of the righteous. While there are more good and faithful wives and mothers now than there ever were, society has got a wrong twist on this subject, and there are influences abroad that would make women believe that their chief sphere is outside instead of inside the house. Compare the genuine practical woman of the past and the present with one of these attitudinizing, frivolous married coquettes of the modern drawing-room; her heaven an opera box on the night of Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable;" the ten commandments an inconvenience; taking arsenic to improve the complexion; her appearance a confused result of belladonna, bleached hair, antimony and mineral acids, until one is compelled to discuss her character, and wonder whether the line between a decent and indecent life is, like the equator, an imaginary line.

Cheerful Exhortation

FRIDAY morning you go into a merchant's store and buy a bill of hosiery. How his face lights up! How cheerful he is! How fascinating he is while he is selling the bill of goods! You go away, saying: "That is one of the most agreeable men I ever met in my life." That very Friday evening you go into the prayer-meeting where that same Christian merchant worships, and you find him getting up and recommending the religion of Jesus Christ with a funeral countenance and a doleful phraseology, enough to make an undertaker burst into tears. How few people there are who talk cheerfully about the religion of Jesus! In other words, that man of whom I spoke, had more exhilaration when he was selling a bill of goods than in recommending the religion which makes all heaven ring with the anthems of the free. Now, ought that to be? How many are driven from the doors of the churches by the simple reason that they do not want such a repulsive religion. They are afraid to shake hands with a Christian man, lest they shall be religiously assaulted. I remember very well how it was when I was a boy. I laid one hour and a half under the raspberry bushes in the garden, to escape from the minister and the elder who came to my father's house on a family visit; and my father came out on the back steps, and cried: "De Witt, where are you?" De Witt made no answer. Ought our religion to repel or attract?

Useless Longevity

THERE is a great deal of senseless praise of longevity, as though it were an achievement to live a good while. Ah! it is not how long we live, but how well we live, and how usefully we live. A man who lives to eighty years and accomplishes nothing for God or humanity might better have never lived at all. Methuselah lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years, and what did it amount to? In all those more than nine centuries he did not accomplish anything which seemed worth record. Paul lived only a little more than sixty, but how many Methuselahs would it take to make one Paul? Who would not rather have Paul's sixty years than Methuselah's nine hundred and sixty-nine? Robert McCheyne died at thirty years of age, and John Summerfield at twenty-seven, but neither earth nor heaven will ever hear the end of their usefulness. Longevity! Why, an elephant can beat you at that, for it lives a hundred and fifty and two hundred years. Gray hairs are the blossoms of the tree of life if found in the way of righteousness, but the frosts of the second death if found in the way of sin.

Evil Prophecies

EVER and anon we have weather prophets who tell us we shall have a very hot summer, or a very late spring, or a very severe winter. I have cut out these prophecies and kept them, and generally found that they were proved untrue. Because some men have made good guesses we elect them apostles of guessdom. It is always safe to prophesy a storm in September, or a drought in summer, or a wet spell in April. The old almanacs issued on the first day of January, announcing that it would be clear, or cloudy, or wet on certain days in the following August or December, were just as trustworthy as the prophecy coming from Canada or the United States telling us of cyclones, or droughts, or deluges, or earthquakes six weeks ahead. Our weather bureau at Washington is providentially allowed to foretell atmospheric changes for two or three days, so that the storm signals may be hoisted, but there are no inspired Isaiahs of the weather to foretell the coming sunshine of many weeks, or inspired Jeremiahs of the weather to foretell the stormy lamentations of a whole season.

God will keep a realm of foreknowledge that no human guessing can ever invade. For the altar of these evil prophets we have no sacrifices. Thirteen are better at a table than twelve, because there is one more to be happy; and the only damage that comes from the upsetting of a salt-cellar is the trouble of sweeping up the salt; and after you have started on a journey it is better to go back and get what you have forgotten; and, excepting Sunday, Friday is the most fortunate day of the week. My friend was in a railroad accident, and amidst the excitement he heard a lady chiding her husband in this wise: "I told you if we started on Friday something would happen." "Why," said my friend, "many fortunate things have happened on Friday, madame. America was discovered on Friday." "Well," she replied, "it is a great pity it was ever discovered." The learned Dr. Johnson said he did not believe in ghosts; he had seen too many of them. And among all classes, learned and unlearned, there are superstitions still lingering.

NEWSPAPER MISTAKES

DO not believe all you see in the newspapers. As an illustration of how an event may be misrepresented, I recall the following incident:

One day, when I was living in Philadelphia, a celebrated balloonist was ushered into my study. He had just arrived from New York with an invitation from one of my scientific friends who wished me to come on to Fifth Avenue Hotel, in the city of New York, and unite him in marriage with a most excellent lady of that city. The messenger said that after the marriage ceremony the wedding party proposed to go up in a balloon from Central Park, the scientific friend before mentioned having made a costly piece of philosophical apparatus by which he expected to experiment on air currents as he ascended to the clouds.

The evening before the wedding I arrived at Fifth Avenue Hotel, where effort was made to induce me to perform the ceremony in the balloon and up among the clouds. But I refused, saying that while I believed in the "higher law," I doubted the legality of a wedding performed so high up above the reach of municipal authority; besides that, my head is apt to get dizzy at a great height, and I might not be able to see straight enough to tie the knot; besides that, it is very risky for any church to have its pastor go so high up, lest, having got so finely started, he should not return, the memory of Elijah flashing across me; besides that, if I should slip and fall from a height of two or three miles, somebody standing underneath would be almost sure to get hurt. Of course, I remembered that "matches are made in heaven," but I do not believe it, for some of them are lucifer matches, and from the odor of brimstone I know they are made in another place. Besides all these objections to performing the ceremony in the clouds, the reporters would get hold of it; and, as it was a dull time among them, I knew that what was left of me after the balloon peril they would finish.

Persisting in this idea, at two o'clock P. M., in the parlor of Fifth Avenue Hotel, I united in wedlock as scientific a gentleman and as good a lady as the country holds. I was invited to go up to Central Park and see the wedding party start on the balloon excursion. Having several hours before the rail train started, I accepted the invitation. The newspapers had stated that I would perform the wedding as the balloon was being cut loose from the earth—the only time I ever knew the newspapers to be mistaken! The great natural amphitheatre in the park had been enclosed. At one dollar a head, a great assembly had been gathered on tip-toe of excitement. The house-tops in proximity were covered with people anxious to see the bride and groom and minister and balloon. It was four o'clock when I arrived on the ground, unaccompanied; and arousing no suspicion as to who I was, I had an opportunity of gazing on the most amusing and side-splitting scene I ever witnessed.

The great balloon fastened to the earth swung and struggled and flopped, as much as to say: "Time to go; bring on your wedding." There were ten or fifteen reporters present. Some of them had their pieces all written;

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has become so dear to us through its work, and giving us information of work being done by those who are seeking to bring the kingdom of God to earth, that we cannot spare it from our home. It is the only good thing that has come from your house. The Red-Letter Testament is a treasure none would part with a copy once they possess it, unless they could get one like it."

MISS EMMA C. HERRICK

Washington, D. C.

"As I con the daily papers, containing details of crime and misery, my heart saddens, and, like Cooper, I can exclaim, 'My ear is pained and my soul is sick with every day's report of wrong and outrage.' On the other hand, I take up THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and see what is being done for the poor and others who are being rescued from poverty and degradation. I take renewed faith and courage that the tares will not destroy the good sown by the many workers of the Master."

Painesville, O.

MAC A.

"Among the many good things in your excellent paper is your fair treatment of the leading questions of our day, and your evident desire to cut out the cruel and one-sided views of the past, even if yet popular; and to help inaugurate the fairer, truer and more enlightened views that are coming. We thank you, especially in the name of Christian womanhood, and for the sake of the brighter day that are coming for all the world—for your treatment of Question No. 6, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Dec. 9, in which you print the self-one-sided view of marriage, which is, or rather, has been, so generally accepted among men, and give the higher and God-created idea of marriage as outlined by Maria Aylmer."

others were busy. One clever fellow, reporting for The New York Winding Sheet, showed me his piece with full description of bride and groom and minister, saying he had never seen the minister and wanted to know if I had, as if I thought that his description was accurate. I told him I thought that it was beautiful, as that if the minister was not satisfied with the he never would be satisfied with anything. The balloon not being quite ready, the bride and groom took a long ride through the park and it was getting toward night, and the reporters became impatient and demanded that the balloon start and the wedding begin. I quietly told one of the reporters that the wedding had been performed two hours before at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. He denied it, till I told him that I was the minister. "It can't be possible," he said, "that you went and did that in the hotel? Why that spoils all my piece. Here is a long description of the whole thing as occurring two miles high! What shall I do with this two columns of fine description? Sir, I demand that you do something to make this report appropriate." I asked: "Would you have me do so?" "Oh," said he, "You must pronounce the benediction, or bless the people, or say a little, or do something religious; I don't care what it is." As I saw the excitement was spreading, I took the carriage and by ten o'clock P. M. was at my home in Philadelphia. But next morning didn't I catch it? One of the newspapers was headed "Wedding in the Clouds! Disgraceful Scene! Talmage Two Miles High! Ceremony Awa Up!" followed by minute description of the minister, standing somewhere near the man in the moon, kissed the bride, and the sat down on the edge of the balloon, and looked ten thousand feet down at the golden sunset and the great city beneath, with all its mighty populations of sentient people, and other things as fine as that. Some of the religious papers were shocked—that is, the lied; and when religious papers do lie, they beat The New York Winding Sheet, for the come to the work fresher. They said: "Here is a regularly ordained minister cutting up antics two miles above the clouds. We feel humiliated. Let us pray!"

It was a great harvest for the pictorial. The news-rooms were filled with representation of "Talmage Getting into the Balloon," "Talmage with his Coat Tail Flying over the Side of the Balloon," "Talmage Performing the Ceremony," "Talmage Congratulating the Bride," "Talmage Begging to Come Down Because He Felt so Chilly," "Talmage Spilled Out a Midnight on the Other Side of Hoboken Asking which Way was Up and Down." We do not remember just the words, but it was as lively as that. The balloon professor got all the money that was made out of the affair, but my compensation was chiefly religious. We got so many good lessons from the secular and religious newspapers about that time that we grew rapidly better, although many did not notice the favorable change. It put me on my guard about weddings, and the next time I married a couple I told them plainly that I was not responsible for their style of wedding trip, and positively refused to go with them anywhere, whether in car, stage or balloon, and that I did not care, after I had married them, whether they went up or down.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

More Pompeian Relics

NEWS has come from Pompeii of the discovery of more relics of the people who were overwhelmed in the eruption in the year 79 A.D. The artist of the Illustrated London News has sent to that journal pictures of a variety of interesting objects which have been found at Bosco Reale, which lies at the foot of Vesuvius not far from Pompeii. One of the Deputies of the Italian Parliament owns a villa at Bosco Reale, and some months ago he commenced excavations in his grounds. By an arrangement with a neighbor they have been extended over a wide area, and have resulted in the discovery of a beautiful house below the surface of the soil. It was evidently buried in the flood of lava and ashes which submerged Pompeii and has remained covered for more than eighteen centuries. It is in an excellent state of preservation. On one of the walls is a beautiful fresco which is reproduced on this page. It is interesting not only because of the idea it gives of the architecture of those days, but because of the light it sheds on the art of the time. The perspective, though not perfect shows that the artist knew more about perspective than we had supposed. The house has not yet been completely uncovered. It is hoped that in the excavations yet to be made, many articles will be found which will shed further light on the life of the people. In the courtyard there are a number of terra-cotta jars, which were evidently used for holding supplies of food. An inscription on one of the pillars intimates that the house was for sale at the time of the catastrophe. Little did the man who put it there, think that the people who would read it were separated from him by fifty generations. He considered it a desirable residence, but now its only value is as a relic of a by-gone time. So times change and his description of his property reads like a mockery. It is well for us that we can look forward to one condition that endures:

For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (II. Cor 5:1).

Our Oldest City

For some years past a controversy has been carried on between Santa Fe, N. M., and St. Augustine, Fla., on the question of their respective priority of settlement. Santa Fe had pretty clearly established its claim to a history running back to 1605. St. Augustine, however, made discoveries of documents showing that in 1562 Admiral Coligni obtained from Charles IX. of France the right to found a French Protestant colony in America and chose the region in which St. Augustine is now situated. But a citizen of Arizona now publishes a statement which relegates St. Augustine to a second place. He claims the priority for Tucson, Ariz., and bases the claim on authentic documents, including a parchment discovered among the records of the old mission of San Xavier, dated 1552, when the settlement was ordered to be established, and attached to which is an account of the founding of Tucson, written in the hand of Marcos de Niza, who explored Arizona in 1539. The settlement of the question is a matter of mere sentimental interest. A better glory for a city to have than that of being the oldest city on the Continent would be that of being the city most like that which John saw in his vision, that was full of righteousness.

And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life (Rev. 21:27).

$50,000 for a Horse

An interesting story is told by the Kansas City Journal, which shows how rapidly the value of land appreciates. An Evangelical missionary named Johnson went to Kansas in 1845, from Richmond, Ind. He settled in Kansas City, then a mere village. After some years he removed to Olathe. He remained there until 1861, when, becoming anxious about the situation owing to the war, he determined to return to Indiana. He went to Kansas City and offered all his belongings for sale at any price they would fetch. Money was scarce so he lost heavily; but he managed to sell everything except a sorrel horse. No one would buy the horse. He heard after many inquiries of a man who wanted a horse, and he went out some distance to see him. He offered the horse for five dollars, but the man had not a five dollar bill in the with such lessons we are slow to learn how death will change the value of all things. The property by which we set such store now will then be of less importance to us than the record of some kind act.

And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water, verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward. (Matt. 10:42).

A Cruel Joke

A press dispatch from Paterson, N. J., reports the serious results of a practical constant fear of pursuit and detection. One night he hid in a stable, and awakening from sleep under the impulse of fear, he rushed out and fell into an open hatchway, hurting his spine. He was taken to a hospital where he has been lying ill of brain fever. His life was despaired of, but happily some one who knew the facts told him the truth, and at once he began to mend and is now on the way to recovery. The doctors say that the assurance that he was not a murderer did the patient more good than all their medicine. It relieved his mind of its burden of guilt and fear. There are many who have experienced similar relief when agonizing under conviction of sin against God; but in their case, relief does not come through learning that they are innocent, but through the assurance that God has pardoned them for Christ's sake.

Being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him (Rom. 5:9).

BRIEF NOTES

Norway and Sweden are the only European countries in which the use of intoxicating liquors is steadily decreasing.

The total number of nominal Christians in 1800 was estimated at two hundred millions; the estimate in 1900 is nearly five hundred millions.

The centre of population in the United States, according to the last census, is now in Southern Indiana. At the previous census it was fourteen miles farther east and three miles farther north.

A statement issued by the leaders of the striking shirt-makers in New York shows that by working hard early and late a worker could manage to earn three dollars a week. They struck when the employers proposed to reduce the wages by one-fifth. They say, and with reason, that it is not possible to live in New York on $2.40 a week.

Five weeks of special meetings in New York have marked the beginning of the year. They are held in the Williamsbridge district in Lyric Hall. Major Geo. A. Hilton, Superintendent of the Madison Square Mission House; Dr. D. Asa Blackburn, Pastor of the Church of the Strangers; Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Rev. J. L. Campbell have been taking part in the movement, which promises to bring in many souls.

Robt. Arthington, the friend of missions, who died recently in England, has left the bulk of his property to missionary societies. One and a quarter million dollars go to the London Missionary Society. Large sums are left also to the Baptist and other societies.

Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, who is continuing the Pastor's College founded by his father, said at its recent anniversary, that every student was an active member of the Temperance Society.

A Japanese Christian on going away from home to his work in the morning, leaves his door unfastened, and puts upon it a notice that "the Christian good book" is lying on the table, and any one is welcome to go in and read it.

The number of immigrants who came to this country during the past year was 448,572. Of these about 100,000 came from Austria Hungary, about the same number from Italy, and nearly as many from Russia. The contribution of the British Isles, principally from Ireland, was 50,000.

The bill for the abolition of the canteen in the army passed its final stage on Jan. 9. The section relating to it now stands: "The sale of or dealing in beer, wine or any intoxicating liquors by any person in any post exchange, or canteen, or army transport, or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States, is hereby prohibited. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to carry the provisions of this section into full force and effect." We may hope that the advocates of the measure will now bend their efforts to some means by which the soldier will be kept from falling a prey to the sutler.

world. Finally, as the man really wanted the horse, he offered the missionary a twenty-five foot lot of waste land for the animal, and his offer was accepted. A few years afterwards the missionary was surprised to receive an offer of five hundred dollars for the land and he sold it. Not long ago he visited Kansas City, and curiosity led him to look at the piece of land he had once owned but had never seen. It was the site of a fine building in a beautiful avenue and could be readily sold for fifty thousand dollars. This was the land that he had taken for a horse that he would rather have sold for a five dollar bill. Thus the lapse of years changes values. Even morning the manager had been obliged to discharge one of the employees for drunkenness. The new applicant was at once installed in his place. A few days later the discharged man meeting his successor, accused him of displacing him by dishonorable means. A quarrel ensued, in which the new employee struck the former employee and knocked him senseless. The injured man soon recovered and left the town, but the other did not know of the fact, and when some of his fellow-workmen told him that the man he had struck had been killed by the blow, he became seriously alarmed. Dreading arrest he fled, and wandered about in

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR'S BIRTHPLACE—GRANVILLE STAPLES AND TWO OF THE ORIGINAL MEMBERS

SEC'Y JOHN WILLIS BAER

BACK TO THE BIRTHPLACE

The Twentieth Celebration of the Christian Endeavor Society at Portland, Me.

BY JOHN WILLIS BAER, SECRETARY OF THE WORLD'S CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR UNION

PORTLAND, Maine, is famous for the excellent quality of its building cement, but the approaching celebration of Christian Endeavor's twentieth birthday, in Williston Church, emphasizes the fact that in the being cemented by Christian Endeavor.

On the opening day of this new century we find in the land of its nativity, the United States of America, the largest number of Christian Endeavor societies. The enrolment is 43,746 societies. Great Britain comes next with 7,000 societies. Let me turn aside here to invite the politicians in Great Britain and those in the Senate of the United States, who in days past rejected the arbitration treaty between England and the United States, to consider the Christian Anglo-Saxon alliance already formed between young America and young Britain by the members of these more than 50,000 societies of Christian Endeavor. The great World's Christian Endeavor convention held last July in the metropolis of the world was the time and place where a treaty of united Christian service and united love was signed and sealed.

The various colonies of Australia just united under one central government were already bound together by the ties of Christian Endeavor, for there are 4,000 under the Southern Cross, and the Dominion of Canada, separated from our own land by an imaginary line, has nearly if not quite 4,000 societies.

China, bleeding and storm-wrecked to-day, was the first foreign country to take from the United States the Christian Endeavor seed, and while the growth has been slow, comparatively, China to-day has not less than 148 societies. India has 459, and has just called the Rev. F. S. Hatch, ex-President of the Massachusetts Christian Endeavor Union, to become its general secretary, and within a few days Mr. Hatch sails from New York to take up his work in the far East.

Germany has 168 societies, and, under the sympathetic championship of Count Bernstorff and others, the society is steadily conquering prejudice. Africa's 139 societies, with many of their members in arms, are passing through trying times. As it was in 1898 during the American-Spanish war, so it is to-day during the British-Boer hostilities—the Christian Endeavor pin adorns the uniform of opposing forces. France has 69 societies; Jamaica, 120; Mexico, 110; Madagascar, 93; Japan, 73; Turkey, 60; Spain, 36. But time would fail me to go through the long list comprising European countries, South American republics, missionary lands and the islands of the sea. The total enrolment makes an interdenominational, international and inter-racial brotherhood "for Christ and the church" of 60,704 local societies, with a total membership of 3,642,240.

There are a number of societies also in unexpected places—in schools and colleges, asylums, institutions for the blind and for the deaf; among car-drivers and motormen, policemen, traveling men, life-savers on the coast, lighthouse employees; among workhouses, almshouses, and schools of reform, and among employees in large factories, among the soldiers in barracks, marines and sailors on men-of-war and merchantmen. The first Floating Society of Christian Endeavor was organized eleven years ago on the United States revenue marine steamer, Dexter, and since that time 123 Floating Societies have been organized, and a most worthy and permanent missionary work has been established in Nagasaki, Japan. Among the victims blown up in Havana harbor on the Maine, were members of the Floating Christian Endeavor Society. There was an active Floating Christian Endeavor Society upon Admiral Dewey's flagship Olympia, that took part in the fight at Manila Bay, and in Sampson's fleet at Santiago were many Endeavorers; and last, but not least, the Christian Endeavor badge was worn by more than one brawny Briton from H. M. S. Powerful in the defence of Ladysmith.

The most conspicuous example of the adaptability of Christian Endeavor, is the organization of Christian Endeavor Societies in prisons, and the evangelistic work of Christian Endeavorers in prisons and jails. A decade ago, the first Christian Endeavor society was started in Wisconsin, and to-day in the United States eleven States have about twenty-five Christian Endeavor societies within their prison walls. The largest Prison Christian Endeavor society, so far reported, is the one in the Kentucky State Prison. It numbers over 500, out of a prison population of 1,300. Christian Endeavor is giving to many a prisoner new meaning to the lines

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage.

But I am prevented by lack of space from mentioning all the many forms of work and activities in which Christian Endeavor has had its part. Think of the battles for Sabbath-observance and against the saloon; of the progress made for total abstinence, the seed sown for a higher standard of Christian citizenship centuries to come Portland is to be famous for cement that binds men together instead of stones.

No one thing that I know of proves more certainly that God is in the Christian Endeavor movement than its remarkable numerical growth. In 1881, one society with fifty members, in 1901, over sixty thousand societies, with over three million members. Twenty years ago, one country, America, giving birth to the Christian Endeavor Society; to-day every nation and land throughout the wide world flies the Christian Endeavor banner. Quietly and steadily, and at the same time with wonderful rapidity and vitality, has this new force come into the church life of the world, and we are only beginning to appreciate how strongly the ties of international fellowship and brotherhood are the Sunday evening and mid-week prayer services of churches which have been revived, the amount of money contributed to missions at home and abroad, the Sunday Schools recruited, and the large number of our associate members won to Christ and led into the church.

Ten years ago a host of Endeavorers gathered at Portland, Maine, and worthily celebrated their decennial anniversary. Next week, in the same place, Christian Endeavorers will rally for their twentieth celebration. A general committee of Portland Christian Endeavorers under the chairmanship of Rev. E. R. here" is the universal and oft-expressed conviction.

Such an anniversary as this is a natural opportunity for reflection and philosophizing, a time when one instinctively seeks explanation for things which have become commonplace, like the rapid growth of the societies. Under such circumstances and at such times as these, a self-conscious analysis becomes allowable. What is revealed? A strong grasp upon simple, evangelical, evangelistic Gospel truth; a desire to have more complete and practical knowledge of the Bible; an outlook upon work bounded only by the entire conquest of this world for Christ; a sense of comradeship in his army; an effort to improve our citizenship with a willingness to sacrifice party rather than principle, and a prayerful desire for a great spiritual awakening.

Wonders of the Planet Mars

Astronomers Do Not Believe in Tesla's Theory of Interplanetary Communication...

IN view of the widespread discussion excited in scientific circles, here and abroad, by the published statement of Professor Tesla, the great electrical expert, that he believes the planet Mars has been signalling to the earth, this description of the planet by the famous European astronomer Flammarion will be read with unusual interest:

We know Mars better than the earth was known before the time of Columbus. We know the climatic conditions of Mars better than we know those of the earth to-day. We cannot tell what the weather will be to-morrow on the earth, but we all know what it will be on Mars, since it is always fair. Whereas no one has ever seen either the North or the South Pole of the earth, one pole of Mars is always observable. The conditions of observations are peculiarly favorable, on account of its proximity and because when Mars is in opposition it receives the full solar light.

On Mars circulation of water takes place not by rain and rivers as on the earth, but by melted snows from the poles distributed over the planet by a system of canals. The circulation of water is horizontal instead of vertical as on the earth. Clouds on Mars are almost unknown. The canals as seen by astronomers are certainly water courses, but their dimensions are greatly exaggerated by growths of vegetation on each side, just as from a balloon the valley of a river on the earth appears to be the river itself.

The melting of polar snows has a greater physical effect on Mars than on the earth. Here the polar seas are joined by oceans, and when there is a thaw at the Arctic Pole the rise of waters means a compensating depression at the Antarctic Pole. On Mars the great sea environing the South Pole has no connection with the seas about the North Pole, and the equilibrium of water in both hemispheres of Mars can be sustained only by canals. These canals run in straight lines for thousands of miles.

On Mars the seasons are twice as long as on the earth. On Mars the diurnal rotation is thirty-seven minutes, twenty-three seconds longer. The inclination of the axis of rotation is similar to that of the earth. The surface of Mars frequently undergoes extraordinary changes; seas, lakes and canals appear to double and treble and then return to a simple state; tracts of land as large as France increase and diminish, change shape from round to square, and vice versa, break in two and finally appear double. This may be an illusion caused by some phenomenon unknown on the earth.

The luminous projections reported from the Lowell Observatory are not a discovery, but are observed every two years. These projections are produced by the sun shining on the line of white cloud or high mountains visible on the northern border of the Jearian Sea.

It should be explained that conservative scientists on both continents do not believe in the practicability of interplanetary communication, and refuse to discuss Professor Tesla's so-called discoveries.

Saturday Evening—Informal reception in City Hall, given by the Portland Christian Endeavor Union to President Clark and the officers and trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor.

Sunday Morning—8.30 to 9.30, Daily Quiet Hour. 11.00, Preaching services in all the churches of Portland. Pulpits occupied by visiting delegates.

Sunday Afternoon—2.30, Praise Service. Address, Christian Endeavor and Young Men, Mr. John Willis Baer, Boston. Address, Christian Endeavor and Citizenship, Rev. W. F. Wilson, Hamilton, Ont. Address, Christian Endeavor and Missions, President John Henry Barrows, D.D., Oberlin, Ohio. Farewell words by President Francis E. Clark, D.D.

Sunday Evening—7.00: Preaching services in all the churches of Portland. Most of the Convention sessions will be held in Portland's beautiful city hall. Portland is crowded with Christian Endeavor memories. The Williston Parsonage, where the first society was organized, will be a point of interest; and at one corner will be found a grocery store and dwelling house, which was once the mission, out of which, in Dr. Clark's pastorate, grew Williston Church.

It will mean a great deal to any Endeavorer, in all his after life, to have borne some part in that mont, New Hampshire, and of Rhode Island.

The pioneers of Christian Endeavor will be there, the charter members of the first society, and of the other early societies, men and women who were "first" in all sorts of Endeavor that now have belted the globe.

Throughout the coming anniversary days the current of thought will very naturally be turned toward the breadth of the Christian Endeavor movement. It will be well to keep in mind that God's hand has caused its swift, continuous and irresistible progress. In the dawning light of its third decade, the extent of Christian Endeavor stands out with startling clearness. But bigness is not greatness; and the deeper currents of thought at this twentieth birthday season will be directed to the depth and volume of the movement, as well as with its area and surface. PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS

Camps Useless Without Oil in the Vessels

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON
for Feb. 3: Matt. 25: 1-13

GOLDEN TEXT, Matt. 25: 13: "Watch therefore; for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh"

By...
Dr. and Mrs.
Wilbur F. Crafts

THIS lesson comes to us in the winter revivals, just when it is needed to teach us that church membership and its sacraments will not of themselves save us, as charms, but only as they are vessels through which we receive and manifest the spirit of Christ. He is the bridegroom in the story (John 3: 28, 29; Eph. 5: 25; II. Cor. 11: 2; Matt. 9: 15; Rev. 21: 9). The virgins represent the Church, so often symbolized by a woman, though once by "men," waiting as here, for the coming of the bridegroom (Luke 12: 36). Religion is everywhere too much left to women. The "manliness of Christ" should attract all who seek to be truly manly. The lamps stand for religious forms, of value only when filled with the oil of Christ's spirit, which manifests itself in the light of a noble life.

Jesus spoke this parable sitting upon Mt. Olivet with his apostles, a few days before his crucifixion.

Coming to Christ is Coming to Joy and Love

Went forth to meet the bridegroom. This is one of eight hundred times that the Bible pictures a Christian life as one of joy. In many passages, to come to Christ is like the thirsty coming to a spring of water. In many more, coming to Christ is coming to a feast—in this and other cases, a feast combined with wedding joys and songs and lights in the night. Young people still talk with dread of having to "give up so many things to be a Christian." God asks us to give up nothing but sin and the sorrow it brings; no pleasures but those that make headache and heartache, which we should give up for our own sakes if there were no other world but this. We cannot repeat too often that "self-denial is only self-love, living for the future." What do we give up in coming to the Bridegroom? We give up hunger to receive a feast. We give up silence for a song, and darkness, to walk in the light, and lonesomeness of soul for love and a home, for in other parables cited above the Church is not the virgins that only attend the bride, but the bride herself.

And this reminds us that the joys of a Christian life find their climax in the highest love the human heart can know. How we hunger for love! That is probably the chief reason why dogs, whose manners are about the worst among pets, are the most prized. Dogs are ardent lovers of their masters, and make no secret of their affection. The most elegant palace is an ice-house when family affection has been killed by distrust or disloyalty; but the lowliest cottage is Paradise regained where that human trinity, the father, the mother, and the child, live in love together. Jesus honored and glorified such love when he so often compared himself to a bridegroom, and called the Church his pure and happy bride. One thing young people ought to learn from this, who talk or think of marriage as "midway between a joke and a crime," is that true marriage and pure parenthood are true nobility and perfected life, as they are also perfected joy. And this perfected joy is made the symbol of the spiritual joy to which we are invited in the familiar song, "Come to Jesus, just now." He invites us to the supreme joy of his personal affection. "We love him because he first loved." Faith is friendship, centering in a person, not a creed, or even a book, or any "it." His challenge is, "Lovest thou me?"

Not Church Forms, but the Spirit of Christ Saves Us

Five of them were wise and five were foolish. Fully half of the Bible is devoted to warning church members that ceremonies will not save them—lamps that are not lights. The church field has rocky, thorny, and shallow soil, as well as good, one parable taught, and the good part of the field alone comes to the joy of harvest. The tares and wheat grow together in the church, looking very much alike, till the day when God separates them forever. It is church members in form, though not in fact, that in that parable are "burned." So the net that includes bad fish as well as good is the Church, from which God will at last cast out the "bad." Those whom the prophets and Jesus and the apostles called on to "repent" lest they should "perish," were church members. These warnings are as much needed as ever, and most of all at the entrance to church membership. Every pastor knows that many persons are relying on the empty "lamp" of church membership as a sort of fetish, to save them. The mistake of the virgins was in not taking "oil with their lamps" at the start. The little they had in them doubtless refers to that measure of the Spirit that "lighteth every man coming into the world" (John 1: 9), the good impulses that soon burn out when not reinforced by regeneration.

How Church Membership Helps

There are four ways in which church membership, while it does not of itself save us, does help us by making it harder to do wrong and easier to do right, namely, by the influence of

Promises,
Companionships,
Sacraments,
Teaching,
CHRIST IN US.

That last is what the parable means when it says, "The wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps." The result was the light of life. And this is what light means in a Christian life:

Somebody did a golden deed;
Somebody proved a friend in need;
Somebody sang a beautiful song;

"THEY THAT WERE READY WENT IN WITH HIM TO THE MARRIAGE"

Somebody smiled the whole day long;
Somebody thought, 'Tis sweet to live;
Somebody said, 'I'm glad to give';
Somebody fought a valiant fight;
Somebody lived to shield the right.
Was that somebody you?

In the same spirit, Helen Hunt Jackson, who devoted her best years to defending the Indians against those who robbed and wronged them, sang:

If I can live
To make some pale face face brighter and to give
A second lustre to some tear-dimmed eye,
Or e'en impart
One throb of comfort to an aching heart,
Or cheer some way-worn soul in passing by;

If I can lend
A strong hand to the fallen, or defend
The right against a single envious strain,
My life, though bare
Perhaps of much that seemeth dear and fair
To us on earth, will not have been in vain.

The purest joy,
Most near to heaven, far from earth's alloy,
Is bidding clouds give way to sun and shine,
And 'twill be well
If on that day the angels tell
Of me, "She did her best for one of thine."

In studying the biographies of great men we have noted that many of them were men of great sympathy, not too busy with their great tasks to comfort even a troubled child that might cross their path. Here is such a story told by an old lady who lived in childhood in Concord, Mass. She was on her tardy way to school, crying in anticipation of disgrace and possible punishment, when a deep voice by her side said: "What is troubling you, my child?" Between her sobs Annie explained. "I will write a note to your teacher asking her to excuse you," said the stranger, kindly. The little girl protested. He did not know her teacher. It would be of no use. But the big, black-haired man had written a few words on a page of his note-book, and, tearing out the leaf, handed it to the child. "If you give your teacher that, I think she will excuse you," he said smilingly. Still unbelieving, the little girl handed the scrap of paper to her teacher, who read its contents and promptly excused the child. The note read: "Will Miss —, excuse Annie for being late, and oblige her most obedient servant, Daniel Webster."

Our lamps are gone out. Not everything in a parable has significance. It is doubtful if sleep in this case implies any neglect, as wise and foolish both slept, though it might imply that even the best part of the Church is not fully awake to its duty and opportunity. "Behold the bridegroom cometh" is the cry that awakens all. It refers to the second coming of Christ. The church members who lack a "Spirit-filled life" cry out in vain to more spiritual Christians, "Give us of your oil, our lamps are gone out."

Are You Ready for His Coming?

They that were ready went in with him to the marriage. When Jesus came from heaven to Bethlehem in his first coming even the great ones in his church, the chief priests and scribes and Pharisees, were not "ready" to welcome him. So when he comes again, as he has promised, and as he or in his second coming, should be not dread but our delight. In a certain Christian home two blackboards were kept in the study, one for the Golden Text and central thoughts of the Lord's Day lesson, the other for week-day exercises. The children turn in printing the texts and important sayings—printing that the youngest might read readily. This was done on Sunday afternoon, after which the board was hung against the wall, where it remained before all until the following Sunday when, after return from school, it was erased and ceded by the new text. One day it was mine's turn—the little fingers traced it clearly, distinctly—that Golden Text—that last glorious legacy—that "Light in the Window" was to shine out upon the utter desolation that followed:

"For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then, face to face; now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known."

A few days after, Mamie became dangerously sick. It hung there before the anxious mother that blessed assurance, through the week suffering that followed. Sundays came, but no other text supplanted it. The end drew near and the mother bowed at her child in an agony of woe. "Raise me, mama," she said. One little fluttering hand stole about her neck, the other pointed to the Golden Text, then, with a hopeful, loving look in her eyes, she whispered: "Face to face, mama; face to face!"

The door was shut. Jesus infinite love, places beside picture of the joys of a Christian life here and hereafter a wedding feast, the despair the lost on the wrong side the shut door. They had been content with the little oil of natural goodness, and had neglected to enrich their lives receiving the abundant eternal life of Christ. And the testing hour this had failed. It is not death or the judgment or the second coming alone that puts such lives to the test. Many a one who relies on a little oil of his own good pulses to carry him safe through all tests falls when some unusual temptation to honesty or impurity assails him. He has neglected to receive Christ to rule his passions; in anger he strikes a deadly blow; or in the grasp of a foolish passion he inflicts on some woman a wound worse than death; or he betrays some great financial trust because he not crowned Christ in his heart and life master of this form of covetousness.

He who has long rejected Christ, and chosen sin instead for many often reaches fixity of character long before death. As a poet has sadly sung,

Forever round the mercy seat
The blazing lights of love shall burn,
But what if, habit-bound, thy feet
Shall lack the power to turn?

Watch therefore. It is not an idle watch and waiting for Christ that is enjoined, a glad expectancy in the midst of daily faithfulness, like his own life on earth, as contrast with the conduct of those who said: "Lord delayeth his coming," and so began "eat and to drink and to be drunken." Some people are all about us who put far away only the thought of Christ's coming in judgment, but even the thought of death, and give themselves to a life of selfish greed and pleasure.

In June, 1815, there was a very noble party gathered in a house in St. James' Square, London. The Prince Regent was present; the occasion was made fascinating by music and banqueting and by jewels. While quadrille was being formed, suddenly all people rushed to the windows. What was the matter? Henry Percy had arrived with news that Waterloo had been fought, that England had won the day. The day was abandoned; the party dispersed; the ladies, and musicians rushed into the street and in fifteen minutes from the first announcement of the good news the house was empty of all its guests.

And so the souls who believe that Christ the Conqueror, may come at any hour close the long warfare of right and wrong fighting and winning the Waterloo of faith and complete victory, are drawn out of self-living by that mighty hope.

From low delights and mortal toys
I soar to reach eternal joys.

Thou who has kept us to this hour
O keep us faithful to the end,
When robed in majesty and power,
Our Jesus shall from heaven descend,
His friends and witnesses to own,
And seat us on his glorious throne.
To meet him face to face, whether in death

AROUND THE WINTER FIRE

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Servant Problem

It is safe to assert that no other situation which confronts American housekeepers is so full of difficulties as the question of the servant. The large majority of families in this country, in ordinary circumstances, get along with one maid. Two or three may be kept by ladies who have large means, large households, or delicate health, and, of course, in great houses there are establishments to match wealth and splendor. These are as yet in the minority with us. Where there are from six to ten servants or even more, a housekeeper is essential, and a separate table, with rigid account keeping belongs to the necessity of the case. In such homes it may easily be found possible to introduce a time limit for the work of servants, one set on duty for apportioned hours, eight, or nine, as may be, another relieving them at expiration of a given time. In the usual home this cannot be done. The one maid or the two may have many little breaks in the course of the day. Many five and fifteen minute rests, or perhaps two or three hours in the afternoon for their sewing or their sitting still, but, for maid as for mistress, the housework begins early in the day, when breakfast must be prepared, and ends at night, when the dishes are washed and the bread set for the next day.

Women complain of the inefficiency, ill-temper and general unfaithfulness of the servant class, though there are homes by the thousand where excellent service is the rule. The country housekeeper has no end of trouble in procuring help in the winter, for servants are gregarious, and hate the solitude of the hamlet or the farm. In her extremity the lady takes anybody who will come to her—black, white, Protestant, Catholic, it is all the same in her eyes, and equally all are as broken reeds on which to lean. Few employers are fair enough to look at the case from the point of view of the maid. Mrs. St. Justin Beale, who has looked into the thing, has espoused the cause of the maid with energy and enthusiasm, and has suggested the founding of a training-school in New York, where servants may be duly taught their profession. The idea is novel only inasmuch as it emanates from the servants themselves, and indicates a desire on their part to now something beyond a mere elementary acquaintance by sight with pots and pans, before they undertake to cook for family.

The best training-school, however, will for a long time continue to be a lady's own kitchen, and a thoroughly capable housekeeper, who is prompt in payment, fair in her demands, and not unfriendly in exacting will usually have good help. It would be very interesting to have the readers of this paper tell us their personal experience, and send us suggestions. The question concerns us all, and we ought to help one another in its elucidation.

In candor, I suppose that most of us will concede that there is fault on both sides, or a relation which ought to be friendly would not so often be complicated by suspicion, aversion and dislike of authority in one party, and intolerance and hostility in the other. Our servants are women, less experienced and less thoroughly educated than we, but of similar natures, and as likely to be impulsive and emotional as young girls in any other station of life. They have the social instincts strongly developed, and they long for company, often they are very lonely and homesick, their own people being far away. May we not often find missionary ground in our own kitchens? Do we approve of the maid's having a lover, and where shall she entertain him? Does she save her wages, or spend them wastefully? Is the incursion of the Oriental, the Chinese and the Japanese manservant likely to prove a boon in American households? On these questions will our friends please write freely.

Take With You Words

On all sides leading educators affirm that the vocabulary of American youth is very scanty. This is shown in the prevalent use of slang and of needless expletives, and also is illustrated in examination papers and compositions. Boys and girls have not words to express themselves in clear and picturesque language. Probably there is too little talk at home. Children are often forbidden to take any part in conversation at the table, a great mistake, for the table is the place where most of the home talk goes on. They should not interrupt nor monopolize conversation, but neither should they sit like mutes through a family meal. The habit of eating in silence and haste is a too frequent American sin. We should talk and have something to talk about, something worth our attention.

We must also note that those who read good books insensibly acquire an enriched vocabulary, as do those who always go to church and listen to noble English, expressing noble thoughts, in the preacher's sermon.

Concerning Cats

A beautiful book has lately been published with the above title. It tells all about cats, and the cat pictures alone are most fascinating. Women in some portions of the country are successfully raising high-bred kittens for sale—to a cat lover the business would not be distasteful. Even a common cat when well kept, well fed, and sheltered at night in a soft bed of her own, is a beautiful creature, but a superb Angora, Maltese or Persian cat is an exquisite being, and is sometimes worth a great deal of money. Miss Helen Winslow, who writes the book, has done good service in her pages, not to cats only, but to all dumb animals and domestic pets wherever they are found, showing the claim they have to our care and deprecating any neglect or lack of sympathy toward these gentle beasts, who have so much intelligence although they cannot speak in human language.

American Women in Art

American women were very successful last summer in winning awards in the great Paris Exposition. A beautiful and benignant gentlewoman of New York, Mrs. Candace Wheeler, exhibited a splendid and unique embroidery, the work of many years. It is a tapestry, showing in needle-craft Raphael's world-renowned painting of the miraculous draught of fishes. It won a silver medal. The paintings of Cecilia Beaux received a gold medal, and the same honor was bestowed upon Mrs. Bellamy Storrs for bronze pottery. Two ladies of Washington, D.C.—the Misses Healy—exhibited a case of ceramics and received a silver medal. Bessie Potter Vonnah won a gold medal for her statuettes. So many Americans are studying art in its several branches, that it is very encouraging to find that they were not unrecognized in the person of their representatives abroad.

READY for the party!
And, oh! So bright and gay
Every frill and ribbon right,
That is mother's way.
And at the merry party
The baby must be good,

As happy children should.

The Home Group

MORE than ever happy and united the home group gathers around the fire in the long winter evenings. The darkness falls early, and there is a pleasant stretch of time between supper and ten o'clock, time when parents and children carry on their evening occupations, father reading, the boys studying lessons for the next day, the girls drawing maps and writing exercises, and the mother busy with her mending basket. If there are young people in the household, they may have music and games, often joined by their friends in the neighborhood, for youth attracts youth. Perhaps they will have a stunt party, which is a mirth-provoking affair, requiring several rehearsals and much planning before it can be given successfully.

When it comes off, the young people are paired—a young man and a young lady together. They take any characters they please from ancient history to the present new century, and dress to represent them, doing by preference some droll thing rather than any thing too dignified. They may perform sleight-of-hand tricks if they like, costume themselves as for a cake-walk, or sing a song. At the end of the performance all the characters assemble on the platform and make a final bow, and the spectators vote prizes to the best pair and the worst. The prizes may be a cup and saucer, a caddy bag, a calendar, or anything the givers like, but there should be one for the lad and one for the lass, and the booby prize should be multiplied by two. Refreshments may be served—lemonade, coffee, cake, candies and apples.

The long winter evenings are far more social than the summer nights, when doors and windows are wide open, and people go off on visits or drives, or are too warm and too weary to care for conversation.

I advise in each family the reading of a good book before the season ends. Appoint some one to read aloud, and let no evening pass without a half hour with your favorite author. There are gray-headed men and women who look back to their childhood with peculiar pleasure because of the family habit of reading aloud for an hour before bedtime.

Our Mistakes

Looking back over twelve months, we are aware of many a blunder. At a certain period we acted without judgment, we took the wrong turning. If we did the best we could, asking God for help, we must not mourn over our errors, but try to go on with cheerful courage, hoping for some smiling good fortune just around the corner.

A GOOD-NIGHT PRAYER

"I like to say 'Good-night' to God," our bonnie girlie said,
As reverently she folded her little dimpled hands,
And bent like some sweet lily her lovely golden head,
And then repeated soft and low her evening prayers and psalms.

Her mother listened thoughtfully, and watched with wistful eyes
The hushed and trusting look which came on little Mary's face:
"Good-night to God!" 'Twas wafted up beyond the starry skies,
And God sent down a blessing from his glorious dwelling-place.

THE PROPOSED FARM FOR CONSUMPTIVES

Colorado's Ministry to the Sick

By W. M. DANNER, State Secretary, Young Men's Christian Association

A WORK WHICH REACHES OUT TO EVERY STATE

THERE are few more promising fields for Christian work than are to be found in the Western States. In Colorado, the Young Men's Christian Association has expanded until its widening scope now tallies the width of the western plains, and its good influence begins to measure up to the level of the mountain heights. It has promoted a strong Christian fellowship among the young men of the four chief cities of the State, and has quickened spiritual life in the six leading colleges of Colorado. It is a question of only a little time when it shall be a vital force in the life of camp and canon. Indeed, matters are now all but ripe for the establishment of branch associations at Leadville, Cripple Creek and Victor, which take rank among the greatest mining camps in the world. In view of Colorado's large mining interests and military posts, and the thousands and tens of thousands of the sons of the nation who come thither from every quarter of the Union, seeking health and fortune, the Christian people should feel a warm personal sympathy and interest in the Colorado Young Men's Christian Association, since its mission is to minister physical and spiritual comfort to the young men of the North, South, East and West.

Y. M. C. A. HEADQUARTERS, DENVER

Denver has two branch associations, and there is one each in Colorado Springs, Pueblo and Canon City, beside the six college associations previously mentioned. The work undertaken has been along the general association lines. Denver's branches have been very successful in practical results, the work progressing under an excellent system. It has now become necessary for the Central Department of the Denver association to seek more commodious quarters, and these will be ready for occupancy some time this month. The railway department of the Denver association was represented at the recent Philadelphia Conference by eight delegates, which demonstrates the quick life of that department. The Colorado Springs association anticipates with pleasure an early consummation of their hopes for a new building. During the past year the Pueblo association has been comfortably installed in new and larger quarters. The association in Colorado is fortunate in having in its rank many men of talent and spirit, who are consecrated to the work. Mr. C. M. Hobbs, President of the Denver association and a member of the State Committee, is possessed of a notable faculty for doing things, and is in large demand for anniversary and convention addresses. The Hon. Alva Adams, ex-Governor of Colorado, has made an eloquent appeal in behalf of association work, and his pen and voice are always generously ready for consecrated association service.

The work in Colorado has one crying need. At Colorado's door has been laid a great and increasing burden, which it is no longer able to bear. The burden comes of the constant influx of tuberculous patients. Colorado, and especially Denver, has proved a better health restorer to these consumptives than Italy with its sunny skies, Southern France with its balmy breezes, or Peterhof with its eternal snows. They come by the thousands for health, but they cannot subsist on ozone alone. The question of maintenance becomes a serious and difficult one. Feeling that the Young Men's Christian Association might be able to suggest a means of caring for that portion of this burden which especially appeals to it—namely, the care of the hundreds of young men who come to Colorado, and especially to Denver, seeking aid—the committee on resolutions at the Glen Park State Conference, August, 1899, devised and suggested the plan of a health farm, whereon young men who are able to do a little work might be employed. This plan is thoroughly practicable and has received the cordial endorsement of all who have given its details any consideration. Funds are needed to set the health farm on a self-sustaining basis. A truck-and-garden farm near Denver would afford needed out-door labor and would find an available market for its surplus product. Its establishment would assure young men who came to the West in search of health, wholesome and comfortable care in return for what labor they would be able to perform. It would not be a charity that would demoralize with pity, or encourage dependence.

This is a problem that must be met soon, one way or another. Hospitals are inadequate for the very sick, and those partially restored are a menace to native and vigorous labor. The strong clerk is sometimes superseded by an equally efficient but sickly rival, who will work for half the wage. This is a burden that does not belong to Colorado or to Denver alone. Every day young men come with appeals for help. No matter what their capacity or endorsement, there is not work for all. There must be a remedy.

The carrying of this proposed philanthropy to a successful issue was one of the last desires and plans of the late and lamented D. L. Moody. Shortly before his death Mr. Moody became deeply interested in this work, and proposed a personal canvass on its behalf by the Colorado State Secretary and himself. With his sympathetic nature, he was quick to comprehend the urgent need of Colorado in this matter, and he was melted to tears on hearing some of the pleas from young men whose lives depend on some such plan as is proposed. Speaking to a friend, he said: "I could not stay in Denver and hear these appeals. It would break my heart to do it. We must find some way of helping to bear Colorado's burden. We must help these young men."

Mr. Moody's interest sprang from thorough personal knowledge of existing conditions in Colorado. He gave the State a much longer visitation than was customary for him. He was in Denver three weeks, and spent an equal period in other portions of the State. He studied this question closely, and was eager to assist in finding immediate and practical relief.

The present need is sufficient funds for a beginning. This ought to be $100,000 as a minimum, but the Farm for Consumptives could be started at once, $35,000 were assured by spring. Colorado should have the farm under way by spring. To fail to do so would be the loss of an entire year. The coming harvest-tide ought to mean bread and hope and one sure step toward health to scores of young men. The ground ought to be ready for the seed early in the spring. The young men ought to be at work in March, if not before. All this winter the burden will increase. The plan cannot proceed without help. The State Executive Committee have in hand the generous gift of Dr. Edward P. George, of Hanover, Germany, which will net $3,000 or more. It is hoped that other contributions will flow in from sympathetic Christian people all over the Union to help this worthy cause. All communication and contributions should be addressed to Frank S. Spalding, Treasurer, Kittredge Building, Eighteenth and Glenarm street, Denver, Colo.

SAD HEARTS MADE GLAD

ECHOES of joy and gratitude from homes made happy through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S distribution of Christmas dinners continue to reach this office. All who contributed to our Christmas Fund are entitled to a share in these expressions of appreciation, and they will no doubt feel a warm personal interest in reading the following letters typical of many received:

Mrs. C., No. — West Nineteenth street. — We were so thankful for the dinner. It was a godsend. We made it last two days. Six years ago my husband fell down an elevator and got a hurt he'll never get over. He was a good man to me while he could work, giving me all I needed. I've been trying to do my part by him since he's helpless. With taking in washing, and nursing him, and paying rent, and paying for coal and medicines and the doctor, I've had hard times. But the Lord's been good in letting me keep my husband so long. I didn't think he'd be with me this Christmas. I thank God somebody thought of us.

Mrs. S., No. — Cherry street, rear building, second floor. — You could not have sent your Christmas package to a place where it was more needed. Mr. S. has been sick for four months, and so we were in very bad circumstances, and having a hard time. We thank God for putting it in the hearts of the givers to remember us. I would have wrote sooner, but I had no money to buy a stamp.

Mrs. E. K., No. — West Fifty-fourth street. — It sent a thrill of joy to think someone was trying to make us happy. When one has no work it is very hard to make both ends meet. Now I have work, and things are going smoothly.

Mrs. J. M., No. — East Seventieth street (basement). — I write to thank the kind people of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Christmas Fund for sending us a nice Christmas dinner. We enjoyed it so much. My husband met with an accident over a year ago, and has not been able to do much since. I am in poor health. We have a pretty hard time to pay rent and to get a bite to eat, and we have suffered from insufficient clothing.

C. L., No. — Seventeenth street, rear house, ground floor. — I am very thankful to you for your kinds of the Christmas dinners. (Writer, a German, who found great difficulty in expressing her thanks).

Mrs. K. G., No. — Christopher street. — I was very thankful for the kindness in sending a Christmas dinner to me and my children; I will never forget it. It was all we had that day. I am a widow with six little children. My husband has been dead eight months. I have been striving along, trying my best to do all I can for them. It was hard to think I couldn't give them anything to eat Christmas Day. I am sick with cold, and we need fire, food and clothing. I will never forget the Christmas dinner. God is good. God bless the givers.

Mrs. A. R., No. — West Fifty-third street. — I write to let you know we got your Splendid Christmas Offering, which we all return our sincere thanks, as it was a blessing in the true sense, as we did not have anything, as my husband has been out of work two months, but I go out washing, scrubbing or cleaning; so if you could put anything our way, it would help us greatly. I have four small children.

Hebrew Work for Orphans

The newly published report of the Hebrew Sheltering Guardian Society contains some very interesting facts concerning the work of the organization, since its creation twenty-one years ago, for the purpose of providing Jewish home for neglected, orphaned and destitute Jewish children. The first home had room for fifty children; the present shelters about 1,000, who are fed, clothed and educated by the society, which is raising them up as good American citizens, and thus performing a most important public service for a destitute child left on the streets by a criminal. The Orphan Asylum, occupying a block on the Boulevard, between 15th and 15th Streets, is a beautiful building and the largest institution of its kind in the Western hemisphere. Yet it is not large enough to properly accommodate 1,000. Numbers in excess of this are being turned away and the officers of the society, of whom Samuel D. Levy is President, are making an eloquent appeal for means to make the necessary enlargements.

Building a Great Cathedral

In the Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine, now in course of erection in New York makes a close approach to the wonders of Baalbek. Thirty-two great monoliths are now being cut from the granite quarries of Maine, which, when finished, will each weigh a hundred and sixty tons. They will be fifty-four feet high and six feet in diameter.

Jonathan Long's Ordeal

REV. JONATHAN LONG was trying to write his sermon. It was a hard task. He laid his head on the table and moaned: "O, Lord, if it were a prayer instead of a sermon, I could write fast enough—and yet, would it be a prayer that a minister of God—a man of faith—should write? Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief!"

Yes, it was hard. The wolf was at the door. For the past week Beth's life had hung in the balance, and the minister was worn with much watching and nursing. Even now, when the scale had turned definitely—"prayer-tipped," he said—in Beth's favor, incessant care and vigil were required to hold the advantage for her. And the things she needed! And he had no money!

"Water, papa!" The Rev. Jonathan had dropped asleep. It was an effort to wake, to pull himself together. He was so weak and so tired! "Water, papa!"

"Yes, dear."

In the coolest corner of the room was a dark-gray bundle. Rev. Jonathan Long knelt over it, and from many windings of blanket and newspaper, withdrew a stone jar. This contained, embedded in ice, a number of tiny, large-mouthed jars—such as come from the apothecary's or grocer's, holding concentrated food for invalids. Mr. Long removed one, unwrapped the big jar; and from the little one filled a feeding-pip with cream, which he held to his daughter's lips, coaxing her to take the last drop.

The Rev. Jonathan was a graduate of Yale. He was a graduate, too, in the school of small economies, taking equal honors with Mary, his wife. This refrigerator arrangement and division of milk into minute quantities prevented waste.

In the next room, Mary was sewing—poor Mary! It was a tiny apartment, doing duty as study in day-time and bed-chamber at night. There the Rev. Jonathan had kept his regular office hours during the past week. He always had callers during office hours. He was not eloquent preacher but he was a popular pastor. People came to him with their troubles. Yes, he had sat there listening to the mother, who asked him to pray for her that her child might be converted; to a man whose wife had a bad temper or whose business was going to ruin; or to a woman who wanted to conquer a thirst for strong drink; to a wife whose husband neglected her; to a girl unhappy at home; to a great, strong, slothful fellow who couldn't get to work; to a woman who showed black eyes on her face and who asked him to pray that she might be able to forgive the husband who had struck her—pray that God would help her to be more patient in long-suffering. He had talked with them all, prayed with them, and tried to establish their faith. On his knees he would plead:

"O, Father, we know that thou lovest us, watch over us and our dear ones, and art able to keep and save to the uttermost."

And all the while he would hardly know what he was saying, his unstrung senses faintly informing him that he heard Beth's voice for water to a tired mother who, worn with much watching, had fallen asleep. Then he would recover himself, and with passionate fervor beseech the Almighty to give these people the thing they desired; with more passionate fervor beseech with agony—that he would give the best gift of all—belief in his love and wisdom—whether their desire were granted or not.

"Amen!"

He was asleep again, the sermon yet unwritten. He got out another jar of cream, gave it to the child, and readressed himself to his task.

The Rev. Jonathan, as a rule, prepared his sermons with great care. He would shut out interruptions, give himself up to his subject, compare texts and authorities, and, keeping the color of his own sorrows, struggles and trials out of it, construct for his people a carefully thought-out discourse—a good academic sermon that would not cause any poor, doubting soul to tremble in these times of agnostic questionings and unbelief. He did not have large congregations, and he could not understand why, when he tried so hard and gave such good sound doctrine.

"John, dear," his wife's gentle hand lay on his head, "I hate to wake you, but it's nearly time for church. Here's your breakfast." It was only coffee and rolls, no butter. "I wish I had had an egg for you, poor dear."

He looked at her with wistful yearning and with something of the old lover-look that she always saw in his eyes. She was very young; she had been little more than a child when they had married. Had she realized the cross she was assuming in by, he felt a quiver run through her form; she gave a sob and caught herself, saying: "God is so good. Beth's better. We'll take courage and be more faithful than ever."

But he went out with his brain in a whirl. He had no sermon. He could think of nothing to say to his people—nothing to say.

The mission was full—an unusual thing Sunday morning.

"A rare opportunity to help many souls," he said, "and I'm not ready. I have nothing to say."

The hymns, the prayers, the lessons were finished; and Jonathan stood up and looked in the faces of his people. Everybody who had called on him during the past two weeks—and there had been many, for it had early gone abroad that the minister was unusually "full of the Holy Ghost" and prayed "powerful strong" with troubled folks—were there.

All regarded him with peculiarly kind eyes. The story of Beth's sickness and—as carefully as he had sought to hide them—of severe economies practiced in his home was known now.

"Beloved," he said, "I have no sermon ready. My child has been ill—at the point of death, as you all know. So, I stand before you unprepared to-day. I am depending on God to give me some message that will help you. And I feel called to choose as my text, 'Have faith in God.' I feel that in answer to prayer God has saved my child just as surely as he healed the centurion's little daughter years ago; and so I can say with a full heart 'Have faith in God.' But if he had taken my child—" the minister's voice fell almost to a whisper; for an instant his eyes were blurred with the agony of the trial that had so lately shaken him—"could I still bid you 'Have faith in God?'" He paused long, as questioning himself. Then in a voice low but distinct: "Yes, I could. It does not matter what the trouble may be, there is but one armor in which we may meet it safely—faith in God. If it be death, faith that what seems to be death is but entrance into a larger life. If it be poverty—if the wolf be at the door—if one have not food enough for his dear ones—faith in God is the one resource, the one cordial to keep hope alive, to inspire endeavor, to give strength to the fainting and famished flesh. If friends be faithless—if your dearest has turned against you—then faith in God is your city of refuge, your one security against madness. What is faith in God good for, you question, if it does not bring what we ask for? It is enough in itself!" His voice rang out, clear, sweet, triumphant. "O, my friends, if we had faith in God, there would be no black moments and no haltings for us. There would be no weakness; there would be no failures. Our strength would always be equal to our task."

Even as he spoke, they saw him waver and sink to the platform.

The doctor who attended Beth—a worldly man whom the people didn't like—bent over him and said:

"He has only fainted," and muttered, "he hasn't had enough to eat for a month."

sharing his lot? When, later, he was offered a choice between a comfortable country parish and this struggling city mission and had accepted the latter, feeling that he followed his Master's guidance in working among the poor and the outcast, she had sustained his decision. But again, had she realized what it would bring upon her?

"Mary," he said, with sudden heat, "I'm not going to let you struggle as you have. I'm not going to let Beth suffer for necessities. I'm a man, able to make a living for my family. I'm going to quit the ministry, I'm a failure in it."

"O, John, darling, hush! you're tired and overwrought. Finish your breakfast, now, there's a dear! so you can hurry off to the mission."

"I have no sermon ready," he said, "I don't know what to say to my people."

"Just tell them the truth, then, John. Say Beth's been sick and God's making her well, and how good God is. God will teach you what to say. Depend on God for your sermon, to-day, John."

"God bless you, Mary."

A few minutes later, as looking his best in his worn, black suit, he kissed her good-

CHRISTIAN : : : ENDEAVOR DAY*

What we Have a Right to Hope for from the Enlistment of the Young People in Christ's Service

YOUNG people's societies of all names have a common interest in the celebration of the twentieth anniversary of the beginning of the Christian Endeavor movement. The Epworth League and the Baptist Young People's Union, are practically branches of the great tree planted a score of years ago. Differing from the original society and from one another in minor details, chiefly of management, each has the same cardinal object of uniting young people in bonds of Christian love, for mutual development and for aggressive Christian work. The idea, developed along the three lines with such magnificent success, has had so mighty an influence in the churches, that the twentieth anniversary of its inception must be an occasion for profound thankfulness in each organization. The story of the growth and extension of the oldest society is told on another page of this journal by the secretary, Mr. John Willis Baer. The story shows, that in spite of the frivolity charged against our young people there is sufficient of seriousness and earnestness in their nature to make them appreciate the objects that Christian Endeavor seeks to attain.

What may we hope for in the future, from this mighty force that has developed from that humble beginning twenty years ago? What will be the results to the world of having the millions of Christian Endeavorers, Epworth Leaguers and members of the Baptist Young People's Union openly and avowedly pledged to Christ's service? It is worth while to consider these questions at the beginning of the new period. Mere accumulation of numbers, mere organized force, will count for little unless wisely directed. What ought it to accomplish? In what way cannot it operate for the betterment of the world and the extension of Christ's kingdom?

We may hope that, for one thing, there will be in every community a number of citizens known among their neighbors as men and women of Christian principle, who hold their Christian character dearer than gain, or ease, or social advancement. Twenty years of Christian Endeavor work should have developed such citizens—men who in office or in business, seeking the prizes of life by legitimate methods, would rather fail of attaining those prizes, than succeed by the sacrifice of principle. That attitude requires the courage of a martyr in some circles, but the Christian religion has had its martyrs in every age and it still has the power of producing them. What a magnificent result it would be to come from these years, if the world could see such representatives of Christ in all our cities! How it would prove to a cynical and sceptical society that Christ's teachings are practical, and can be incorporated in twentieth century life. The charge that "every man has his price" would then be disproved by notable exceptions known of all.

Then, too, what a blessing it would be to the world, if in every community there were men and women whose years of Christian Endeavor association had developed in them the spirit and disposition of Christ. The love, and compassion, and helpfulness, and sweet amiability that characterized him living again in his representatives would be a testimony to his transforming power, that would be known and read of all men. No longer would the poor laborers, struggling to improve their miserable conditions, curse the Church, while applauding the Head of the Church, as did the London strikers in Trafalgar Square. The poor and the oppressed everywhere would know that there was at least one class of people on whose sympathy they could count, and they would have intelligent assistance in solving the problems that perplex them.

There would at least be some members of the community who would not be so eager to get bargains as to forget the wrongs that made the bargains possible. The wrongdoer coming out of prison, the social outcast desiring to quit sin and turn to righteousness, would know where to find a helping hand, and people would be convinced that Christ rose from the dead by seeing him in his people. The study of his life and the multitude of prayers for his Spirit during these years, should have produced such men and women, and should go on in the future adding to their number.

Another object that we should hope and strive for is the increase of Christ's followers. If in the three organizations there are more than five million persons, why may we not hope for an addition of five millions more to the muster rolls of the kingdom? Can it be that any Christian is content without bringing at least one soul into the light? The branch that bears no fruit is cut off, and knowing this, may we not hope that one soul at least may be gained by the efforts of each member of a young people's society?

Lastly, how much we may expect from the lesson of co-operation that the young people's societies have taught! No attempt has been made to break down the denominational lines of separation, but these years have so lowered them that men can look over them and see the good work being done in other folds. The men and women who have trained in the young people's societies have learned how many objects the sects have in common, how much stronger are the bonds that unite them, than the differences that separate them. Now, more than at any other previous time in modern history, are the denominations prepared to march shoulder to shoulder as divisions of the same army, under the banner of Christ. This much we owe to Christian Endeavor, and it is a fact full of bright augury of victory. To develop the character of Christ in the life of the individual Christian: to send him out equipped for aggressive service, ready to welcome allies of other names; to make him loyal and courageous and devoted—that would be the grandest, noblest work of the societies.

choir of glorious voices; it had cushioned pews; wonderful stained glass windows by La Farge, and a reredos by St. Gaudens. St. Matthew's was run by one man, people said: Mr. Richmond, who had paid off a debt that hung over the church, who gave the reredos and who always made up deficits out of his own pocket. He had taken a dislike to Jonathan Long. "The fellow's got no go in him," he said, "and he'll never make a success of the Mission."

Meanwhile, Mr. Richmond and the other members of the up-town church came as rarely as possible to the Mission. It happened, however, that Mr. Richmond was in the Mission on the morning that Jonathan fainted; he was there as a critic; he was to report to the vestry next day, and they were to consider whether they should not ask Mr. Long to resign. Somebody repeated to him what the doctor said. The doctor, too, repeated his own words to Mr. Richmond.

"Ministers are notoriously improvident and bad managers," said Mr. Richmond. "They are never practical."

Then the doctor described the refrigerator arrangement, and a few other devices "for making nothing go a long way" which he had seen in the Long home.

The next afternoon, Jonathan called on Mr. Richmond at his office in the bank of which he was president. The banker had made up his mind to save the Long family from starvation, but before he could announce his intention, Jonathan said:

"Mr. Richmond, I want you to give me some employment."

"Do you mean to retire from the ministry?"

"Unless I am more successful, yes. But I did not purpose resigning just yet. I want to give myself another trial. But I haven't a right to expose Mary and Beth to privations when I'm able to work. I'm a good bookkeeper. Can you let me have a set of books to keep at night? I thought as you have various branches of business under your direction, you might be able to give me a job?"

Mr. Richmond was silent, and Jonathan went on: "I think—since Beth's sickness—I know my people better, somehow, I think I can help them, now. I know the Mission has not flourished; and I have not felt that I could look for the advance in my salary promised—"

"I think that sermon when you fainted was the best I ever heard. It wasn't much of a sermon, but it went to people's hearts. Don't ever try to preach an 'able' discourse again. Talk to people's hearts. Your people have been telling me about you. You've been doing better pastoral work than I realized. It would take another man a long time to acquire as strong a hold as you have down there. I don't believe that we up here have done our part by you. I don't want you to keep books. You have enough to do without it. Your salary shall be advanced. I don't know just how much, but the vestry meets tomorrow; I'll lay the matter before them and we'll make you comfortable. Don't waste your time trying to do housework and to save pennies. Give yourself to your people."

It was dusk. Mary was sitting by Beth in the far end of the room. They were so quiet he thought they were asleep. He went softly forward, put his arm about Mary and kissed her. Her cheeks were wet. She slipped her arms around his neck.

"John," she whispered, "have you given up the ministry?"

"No, my darling."

"Thank God!"

"Dear, I'm bewildered. I'm overcome with joy; I can't believe it's true; I'm afraid to tell you—almost afraid I'm dreaming."

"John, darling, what is it?"

"Mr. Richmond says I'm a help to my people—they've been talking to him—they told him so. He says I'm to stay here; to give myself to them more than ever; that the uptown church will stand by me."

"Thank God! Thank God!"

"And they're going to pay me enough to live on—enough to make you and Beth comfortable and happy."

She had slipped to her knees, sobbing for joy.

"Mama!" Beth stirred.

"Yes, my darling."

"Mama, God is good," murmured the child, saying in her sleep the words that, waking or sleeping, she had heard so often above her couch. "Mama—papa—have faith in God."

How the Astors Became Rich.

They Amassed Millions of Dollars Without Risk or Labor.

The present generation who have watched the enormous growth of the Astors' fortune have noticed that their real estate has increased in value almost exactly in proportion to the increase in the population of New York City. The head of the family was shrewd enough in the '40's to buy land and let it grow.

New York City is now growing faster than ever, and is absolutely certain to become the greatest and wealthiest city in the world. Heretofore it has been necessary to have several thousands of dollars in order to buy real estate, but capital backed by enterprise has made it possible for every one in the United States to make an investment. Any one who can spare $1.50 per week can buy property within 35 minutes of New York City Hall, property that is guaranteed to increase in value 25 per cent. this year; if this is not proven at the end of the year, money will be returned with 6 per cent. interest. DROPPED IT.

Quit Coffee and Got Well.

"My breakfast never seemed complete without coffee, but the stomach became gradually weakened, although I had no idea of the cause. An hour or so after eating, a dull aching pain would come in my stomach and sick headache set up. This misery would continue two or three hours, increasing to an intense burning pain, until relieved by vomiting, then I would quickly recover.

"These attacks grew more frequent, and the pain more intense, until it began to affect my general health. I tried many remedies for strengthening my stomach, until finally noticed that the much loved coffee appeared to have a wooden taste, and I concluded to see what effect leaving it off, would have.

"In a short time, the sick, aching attack ceased entirely, gradually my stomach regained its vigor. I began drinking Postum Food Coffee and I discovered by experiment that it has a delicious crisp coffee taste, and yet I could drink all I wanted of it, without any oppression; on the contrary, it gave me a well fed, nourished and lightened feeling instead of the old oppression.

"My general health has been greatly improved and I am able to eat, without fear many things I dared not attempt before. I am grateful that some one has found so satisfactory a beverage. It is already a boon to thousands who have been troubled with coffee drinking, and there are yet thousands who if they knew the cause of their trouble would get well by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. Please omit name." Name and address furnished by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

A PROSPEROUS CHURCH

Phenomenal Growth of the Tompkins Avenue, Brooklyn, Congregational Church During a Quarter of a Century

NOTABLE example of church development is found in a Brooklyn Church which recently celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. It is the Congregational Church in Tompkins Avenue, which Dr. Robert R. Meredith is now

Peter Palmer and his wife; Mr. Henry M. Heath and two members of his family; the widow of Gen. H. Heath, Mrs. James A. Shoudy, Mrs. Lemuel F. Dinsmore, and Mrs. Alonzo E. Bingham.

Every Lord's Day services were held in the old school-room, and preachers of the denomination famous for their adherence to the old Gospel doctrines, rather than for their eloquence, preached by invitation of the little church. A thriving Sunday School was organized, which, as usual, brought other families into connection. In a short time the new church was strong enough to have a pastor. It found him in Rev. Charles D. Helmer, of Chicago, to whom it extended an invitation. He accepted the call, and assumed charge early in 1876. The congregation increased so rapidly that more commodious quarters were needed, and they were secured by leasing an old Presbyterian church in the immediate neighborhood.

The church, however, was called in the providence of God to pass through bereavement. Dr. Helmer's health broke down, and in a few months he was called to his reward. His successor was Rev. Samuel M. Freeland, of Newton, Mass., but he, too, found it necessary to resign after a brief pastorate. During the following year the church heard many preachers, but it was not until December, 1880, that it had again a pastor of its own. This was Dr. George F. Pentecost, the famous evangelist, now pastor of a church at Yonkers, N. Y. Under his leading the church made substantial progress. It also began aggressive work by establishing a Sunday School at Park and Marcy avenues, in addition to the one in the home building. So successful was this extraneous effort that it soon became possible to establish a church there, and a building was erected, which the Tompkins avenue church has maintained ever since as a branch church. Meantime, the original church had continued to grow, and when, in 1887, Dr. Pentecost was induced to leave his church to undertake an important work in London, he left a well-organized membership of 959 souls.

After a brief interval a call was extended to the present pastor, Dr. Robert R. Meredith, then of Boston, Mass. A new era of prosperity was immediately inaugurated. An eligible lot on the opposite side of the street was purchased, and new buildings for the accommodation of the church and Sunday School were erected. They covered an area of 205 feet in length by 135 in width, and cost, with their site, $251,479. The auditorium provided seating capacity for over 2,000 persons. The methods of church work adopted at the organization were continued under Dr. Meredith's pastorate and God's blessing has rested on them. During the entire career of the church 4,134 persons have been received into membership, 2,687 of them during Dr. Meredith's pastorate. The present membership is 2,291, and that of the Sunday Schools 3,512.

pastor. The story of its origin and growth is worth the telling, because of the proof it furnishes that Gospel preaching is efficient without sensational methods, and pulpits eccentricities of doctrine to build up a church.

Twenty-five years ago, a band of twenty persons, some of them descendants of the

TOMPKINS AVE. CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Pilgrim Fathers, met together to consider the advisability of organizing a Congregational Church in a district of the city where such an effort appeared to be needed. It was a small number to form the nucleus of a church; but they united in Christian fellowship, and held their first church service in a school-room on Tompkins Avenue and McDonough street. Of twenty members at that first service, eleven witnessed the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary. These were: Dr. Charles Hopkins and his wife; Mr.

THE DOCTOR'S WIFE

Watches the Effect of Proper Feeding.

"I have an excellent opportunity to know of the effect of food in sickness, for my husband is a practicing physician and has been recommending Grape-Nuts food for some time. I have watched the result and have never known a case where it has not given satisfaction.

"One instance will perhaps suffice to illustrate: A professor in the high school here was in very poor health from stomach trouble. He finally got into such a condition that he could not eat any food whatever without suffering, and was so reduced in strength that he could hardly walk. He was put on Grape-Nuts food and gained rapidly and is now in good health. His recovery was effected by the use of Grape-Nuts food." Mrs. Dr. Lyman, Croton, O.

HOW HE FOUND CHRIST

The Conversion of Dr. C. L. Thompson, Sec'y Presbyterian Board Home Missions

HARLES L. THOMPSON was born near Allentown, Pa., of good old Pennsylvania Dutch stock. When he was about ten years of age the family moved to Portage, Wisconsin, a very new region, then regarded as wild frontier. They did not immigrate in a fast train as nowadays, but in a wagon. On their way from Milwaukee to Portage, Charley lost his cloak out of the wagon. A careless thing to do, you may say, but that lost cloak was a providential affair that had much to do with all his after career. On what slender threads great interests often hang! A young missionary, on the way to his appointment at Fort Winnebago, found the boy's cloak, swung it on his saddle-bow, and, overtaking the wagon with the moving family, returned the garment to the happy boy, and so made the acquaintance of the new settlers.

This young missionary, the Rev. W. W. McNair, soon opened services at Portage, then a village of a few hundred people. Having the true pastor's instinct, he cultivated acquaintance with the bright-eyed boy whose friendship he had won through restoring the lost cloak. Like any good mother, Charley Thompson's mother was pleased at the special interest the young preacher took in her boy, for he was her only child, and the very apple of her eye. This Christian mother, from Charley's infancy, had dedicated him to God, and, if it should please Him, to the ministry. In this new acquaintance and friendship with the missionary, she recognized the answer to her prayers. Henceforth the mother and the young pastor worked and planned together for the education of the boy. There were no good schools. The pastor became the boy's teacher, and in his own study started him in Latin. He saw the need of a school for the boys and girls of his charge, and induced a young minister from New York—the Rev. John Brittain—to come to Portage and to open an academy.

This was about 1854. The school flourished from the start, and was named the "Classical Institute." The Faculty was small, but any school with John Brittain at the head was entitled to be called "Classical." In addition to scholarly tastes and acquirements, he possessed that rarest of all powers, the power to awaken interest and enthusiasm in young minds, which makes them willing to deny themselves, and struggle for the attainment of knowledge. Though then in the grip of the disease which in a few years carried him off, this devoted young scholar addressed himself with cheerfulness and courage to his work. He died young, but a great group of men who have attained large usefulness in various professions, and whose lives have been an ever-increasing benediction to the world, look back to John Brittain as the supreme human inspiration of their lives.

Very early in his school course, Charles Thompson was led to confess Christ as his Saviour. As he looks back now from the high vantage ground of half a century, he is not able to separate the strands of that precious threefold cord that led him on—mother, pastor, teacher—these three, at one in their purpose and drawing, led him to the Saviour and the ministry. He recalls, with a deep and precious joy, one evening in his pastor's study—it was the evening when he made the great decision. There, in the quiet of his study, the young missionary, who, from the day he handed the boy his cloak from his saddle-bow, had never let go of him for an hour, felt that the time had come when Charley should definitely settle the great question of his soul's salvation. As he pressed home the claims of Christ to his service and love, he found the way already opened by the teachings of that mother whose prayers and devoted Christian life, as well as her teaching, had kept her boy close to God.

And many a time in the years that have gone, Dr. Thompson has lived over again the moment when he made the pledge to the pastor, whom he loved, that he would give his life to the service of Christ. He can never forget the happy walk afterwards through the tingling winter night, when the stars seemed nearer and brighter, and more beautiful than they had ever appeared before. All nature seemed to share the joy of this new consecration and purpose. Once a Christian, he started for the ministry almost as a matter of course.

The Rev. W. W. McNair, the noble Wisconsin pioneer preacher, organized two churches in that State, both of which are now strong and flourishing. He continued in the active pastorate until within a few years. His home is now in Philadelphia. That church at Portage recently celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, and that first pastor was present to recall the early days and to rejoice in the harvest of his sowing.

When Dr. Charles L. Thompson was elected Moderator of the General Assembly in Philadelphia, in 1888, the hand of that young missionary, now the venerable Rev. W. W. McNair, was the first to grasp his, and as he recalled the time, nearly forty years before, when he had picked up the lost cloak of a little boy in the wilds of Wisconsin, he exclaimed: "Charley, can this be true?"

Famine in Shansi, China

Rev. F. C. H. Dreyer, the only American missionary who escaped from Central or South Shansi during the recent terrible Boxer riots, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in behalf of the distressed native Christian population of Shansi, where the horrors of famine have followed the desolation of war. Mr. Dreyer was one of a party of fourteen missionaries who left Ping-yang-fu, Shansi on July 15 last, and after a perilous journey of forty-five days, reached Hankow, two children of the party having meanwhile succumbed to hardships on the way. Nearly fifty foreigners and a large number of native Christians were massacred in Shansi.

Two successive crops have failed in the province, and a population estimated at 4,000,000 is now suffering in consequence. Chih-li, Shantung, Northern Honan and Shansi are also affected. Mr. Dreyer states that $50,000 are needed to keep the native Christians of Shansi alive until the next wheat harvest. All the missionaries are using their efforts to obtain help from abroad to assist them in tiding over the crisis.

RELIGIOUS PROGRESS IN CUBA

Complete Freedom of Worship Now Enjoyed Under American Control

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

HAVANA, CUBA, January 3, 1901.—Cuba is a changing country. I think that it is changing for the better. Certainly many of the changes that have taken place during the last two years have been for the better. Moreover, they have been of a kind to encourage those Americans who may be thinking of coming to the island and settling.

In reviewing a few of the things that have happened since the American flag went up on January 1, 1899, and the Spanish flag went down forever, one of the most important to me seems the complete freedom of religious worship. Of course, under the American flag there could be no union of Church and State, as had been the case with the Spaniards. Up to that time a single Protestant congregation existed in Havana. This was the Baptist Church, of which Dr. Diaz is the pastor, and which had managed to secure the concession of a cemetery for the burial of those outside the Catholic faith. Now there are several English-speaking Protestant congregations, and chapels or missions are maintained by the Episcopalians, the Congregationalists, the Methodists, the Baptists, the Presbyterians, and the Disciples. The Quakers also are established in a modest way.

All these Protestant churches do not content themselves simply with the holding of religious services on Sunday. They do a great deal of practical missionary work, and most of them hold services in Spanish as well as in English. They are not limited to Havana, because the other day in Matanzas I was told that the Methodist Episcopal Church here owned its own house of worship, one of the first instances of the kind in the island.

Some political changes are going on, of which it is not necessary to treat now, except to express the belief that, while Cuba will give its own constitution and its own independent government, the moral support and the protection of the United States will never be entirely withdrawn from the new commonwealth, which may be known as the Republic of Cuba. The process of establishing this new commonwealth will be gradual, and its various steps can be followed as they are taken. There is no probability of a sudden and complete withdrawal of the American authority, and whatever may be the uncertainties of the future government, the protection of the United States always will be assured to its citizens in Cuba.

I write of this, because some letters which I have reached me renew inquiries about the aspect for Americans securing homes in Cuba, the nature of the land titles, and other matters. Some of these questions have been answered in the past, but the answers may be repeated in the light of the experience of those Americans who have established themselves in the island during the last three years. Scattered throughout the provinces are a surprising number of those who have bought land and settled down as farmers. Some of these came with the soldiers, or civil employees of the American officials, and had the best chance to pick out places for settling. Others got together some means, came down to look over the ground, and when they saw what suited them, they bought land. Some who were drawn into ill-advised objects of colonies and who suffered loss in consequence, yet had pluck enough to stay and make a home for themselves.

I want to emphasize the point about all those who are succeeding are the ones who have gone out into the country, and have not tried to make their fortunes in Havana, Santiago, or the other cities. They have recognized the great truth that, since Cuba is one vast farm, the best chance for the newcomer is in farming. So they have got land, and gone to raising fruits, vegetables, coffee, and in some cases sugar-cane. I have noticed that the Chinese truck gardeners, who are so numerous around Havana, are no longer monopolizing the trade. Some Americans who went a little further out into the country and engaged in truck-farming, are doing very well. Down at Guines, which is a real market-garden of the island, and which raises great quantities of onions and fish potatoes for the New York market, Americans are beginning to make headway. Quite a number of cases where they have gone to raising oranges, they are doing very well, though, of course, it will be two or three years yet before they can raise and market a crop. Americans also are doing well in pineapples; and in traveling around I have noted some progress in dairy-farming, and even an effort to raise hay and bale it for the market, after the American way.

These observations apply to the settled portions of the island, which, notwithstanding that they are settled, have much good land still uncultivated. The era also has begun of opening up the undeveloped portions of Cuba. The most important of these enterprises is the building of what is known as the Central, or Backbone Railway, which will connect Havana with Santiago, at the southeastern end of the island, and which will have branches running to the ports on the north and south coasts. This has been undertaken by Sir William Van Horne, who carried out the project of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He is supported by American, English and Canadian capitalists. An enterprise of this kind could be promoted only by men of large means, but in time the men of smaller means will be benefited, for they too will have the chance to acquire lands, and will be assured of the means of getting their products to market. Railroad building is only an incidental feature of the Van Horne project. Sir William told me that the immediate purpose is to open up the undeveloped resources by establishing sugar plantations, fruit farms and the like. The scene of operations will be in the eastern part of Santa Clara province, and in Puerto Principe and Santiago.

While, as I stated, this railway project will be of great benefit to Cuba, and while later it will be a means of encouraging American immigration, for the immediate future I should not advise those who are thinking of making homes in Cuba to depend upon it. They will do well to keep closer to the cities and ports which already are within reach. Naturally this means that they will have to pay more for their lands than by going further into the interior, where the country is yet entirely undeveloped; but I think that they will succeed better. I believe a man with five thousand dollars capital will be able to turn it over quicker in a part of the island where land may cost from fifteen to twenty-five dollars an acre, than by going to the undeveloped section, where he can buy it at from three to five dollars an acre. That is to say, two hundred acres in the more settled sections will yield him better for the first few years than a thousand acres in the undeveloped regions.

About the climate it is now possible to speak with more certainty than a year or two ago, for there are many Americans who have passed their third summer in the island. Their general verdict is that the climate of Cuba need not bar persons from Northern countries from settling in the island. After a few years, they will not work with the same fierce energy that usually characterizes them when they arrive from the temperate zone, but they will know how to adapt themselves to the climate and to the tropical modes of living and working. There is everything in that knowledge. It is harvest season all the year round in Cuba, and work can be done in the fields in the early morning almost every day in the year. On the sugar plantations the workers are astir at four or five in the morning, and they are able to put in half a day's work before the sun becomes too hot for comfort. That is the real secret of working in the tropics, to do it at the right hours of the morning and evening and to work quietly and steadily, but not at a driving pace, which destroys the energies without increasing the output of a man's labor.

CHARLES M. PEPPER.

Modern Athens

Few people, save Greeks, writes George Horton in Scribner's Magazine for January, know that modern Athens is in reality two cities, each differing from the other in climate, traditions, and, to a great extent, in character of population. Winter Athens, roughly speaking, is the resort of tourists, diplomats and climate-seekers. It is a European city where one eats course dinners at the Angleterre Hotel, attends service at the English church, dances the barn dance at Madame Schliemann's, and plays charades in the library of the American school. In winter Athens, one talks English or bad French. Even your Greek friends persist in greeting you with a bon zoor, moshion, when you meet them in the street, and you go to the Opera House to hear the "Chimes of Normandy" sung by a company from Paris. The climate of the European period is delightfully cool, with frequent rains. The genuine Greeks, who have no fires in their houses, and no heating apparatus other than portable braziers, will tell you that it is bitter cold, although the thermometer may deny that the freezing-point has been reached. This state of affairs lasts from about the 1st of October till the 1st of May. Then all is changed. The diplomats and the climate-seekers hie them away, and the tourists cease to come. And now the Greeks swarm in from Egypt, from Turkey, and from Roumania, and fill the hotels. They drink resin wine and masticha at a penny the glass; they eat pilaff, stuffed courges, and fish with garlic-sauce, by candle-light in the squares; they attend the open air theatres to hear the divine Paraskevopoulou in the "Medea," or the wonderful Pantopoulos in some island comedy, and everybody talks Greek. Your Greek friends, when they meet you in the streets, salute you with "Good-day, sir."

So, you see, if you have not lingered on into the summer you know little of the real modern Athens. This, too, is the Athens of classic dust and of purple sunsets. And how suddenly the transformation from winter to summer takes place! You are walking about jauntily with no overcoat, despite the fact that the Greeks are bundled up and that they tell you shiveringly, "It's very cold." You wait and wait for the advent of winter, and then, all at once, the natives are abroad in light clothing and they cry out, gayly, "Spring has come!" And lo! the almond trees have shaken out their scented kerchiefs and the anemones are blooming by the roadside.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. Mary M., Phila., Pa., writes:

In reading "Answered Prayer" I was renewed in faith; and now I must tell you of the conversion of my son, for whom I have been praying twenty-five years.

N. W. H., Birmingham, Ala., writes:

For a young friend, who had become overpowered with the temptation of drink, I had prayed for some time, but I seemed to be praying in vain. One Sunday I picked up THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. After reading the column of "Prayers Answered," I made up my mind to pray more earnestly, and with more faith.

Mrs. I. W. L., Luther Springs, N. Y., writes:

I prayed God to bring my boys to him. He has done it.

C. F. G., Troy, N. Y., writes:

I want to thank God for an answered prayer; after praying for nearly a year for a certain blessing, the answer came so direct, that it seemed almost as if the Lord had spoken to me.

Thankful One, Royal Oak, Mich., writes:

Some time ago a deep sorrow seemed about to enter our home. I prayed God for our loved one. God has answered that prayer.

C. R., New York City, writes:

My heart was full to overflowing for the spiritual welfare of a loved one. I felt something must be done at once, and I went to my Saviour in earnest petition; in less than an hour, I unconsciously spoke the words that turned the tide of my loved one's thought in the right direction. I know this was an answer to my prayer.

M. T. R., Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

I acknowledge an answer to special prayer. "It shall come to pass before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking, I will hear." O, what a promise, and all may claim it!

P. I. G., Hanford, Va., writes:

I have gone to God many times with a sad heart, and he has made me glad. He has given me many things I prayed for, everything for the best.

V. A. E., Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

Several times have I had immediate answers to prayer. At other times answers were more delayed for reasons unknown to me, but known to God; and so I am content.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have been received from B., Pueblo, Col.; B. L. E., Tillamook, Ore.; J. L. S., Murphysboro, Ill.; J. E. W., Los Angeles, Cal.; J. M. C., Chicago, Ill.; M. M. Thousands of women endure the tortures of living death and at last succumb to the diseases peculiar to their sex without knowing of the life and health which is theirs if they use Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, an ever faithful remedy that relieves where all others fail. Sad is the sight and pathetic is the story of thousands of young mothers who every year are carried to their graves leaving little children to struggle alone in the world without the tender care and wise counsel of a mother.

Weak wives should profit by the story of Mrs. Grace Campbell, of No. 391 Logan St., Grand Rapids, Mich., now 28 years of age, who was afflicted with a complication of diseases. Her story, as told in her own words, follows:

"The birth of my first child left me in a deplorable condition. My system was broken down and I suffered from general debility. I was exceedingly nervous and rheumatism also troubled me. My appetite failed me and the most delicate and inviting food failed to tempt me. I was thin and pale, and had neither energy nor ambition. My case had been growing steadily worse for two years. I had used several so-called remedies but found no curative qualities in them.

"In the summer of 1898, I was visiting my grandmother in Ludington, Mich., and there learned of the wonderful relief effected by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I tried the Pills and had not finished one box before I felt much better. I continued taking them through the year and the result was a perfect relief. I am no longer nervous nor rheumatic and have more than regained my lost flesh. I certainly recommend the pills to all who need them and their results have always been beneficial.

These Questions Will be Answered Feb. 27

1. Is it wiser for a pastor desiring a revival in his church to undertake the preaching of special sermons, or obtain the services of an evangelist?
2. How can reverence best be taught at the present day?
3. What is the meaning and origin of "True Blue," and when did the color come into use for uniforms?
4. Should a pastor encourage the people of his flock to confide in him as to the sins and faults of their daily lives, that he may advise them? If so, in what does it differ from the Romanist practice of auricular confession?
5. A young worker, very ordinary education, somewhat contrived views of life, but sympathetic from acquaintance with hardship and from personal knowledge of the needs of fellow-workers. Is also young, finely educated, well trained, traveled and with broad views of life, but little knowledge of its struggling multitudes. Both are animated with a sincere purpose to serve Christ and their fellow-men. A inherits wealth unexpectedly; B is already rich. Which of the two is more likely to render the better service?

Questions of the Week

1. Can one be an out-and-out Christian, and yet be engaged in a business which caters largely to the vanity of mankind?

No. A person catering largely to the vanity of mankind, seeks not to help others to strive for higher things than of this world. We are commanded to let nothing worldly claim the uppermost part of our thoughts. As is said in Psalms 39: 5, "Man at his best state is altogether vanity." Man has enough to keep himself from vain things, without having someone catering to the thought. It is the duty of every true Christian to help his brother to lead a better life, and look always to Him for help and guidance among all things. He cannot do this if he also caters to his brother's worldly instincts, and does not help him to centre all his thoughts upon Christ. Therefore, helping, as he does, to divide man's thoughts between God and the world, a person cannot in any sense be a true out-and-out Christian, and cater to the vanity of mankind. L. W. BROOKE.

Perhaps there is no business which caters more largely to the vanity of womankind than the manufacture of headgear in the prevailing style and extreme of fashion, yet there is an "out-and-out" Christian woman in one of our New England cities who has engaged in millinery work for well nigh sixty years and secured a competence by her labor. Even in her busiest days the means of grace were remembered. The prayer meetings and individual Christian work were given their due place. At one time she subscribed for several religious weeklies, to be used as wrapping paper, tucking in a prayer that some one might be reached by a thought from the outside of the bundle. She collected reading matter here, to send into outlying districts, and encouraged her customers there to distribute the same and to establish mission schools. In all her dealings, whether with her patrons, her shop girls, or the poor and destitute about her, she proved her stewardship. And she is, doubtless, but one of many who, through their business relations, have reached out and impressed upon thousands the beauty and desirableness of a consistent Christian character. OBSERVER.

Yes, if the business in itself be not immoral. In the last analysis there is, perhaps, nothing produced by human art which may not be made to cater to human vanity. But, on the other hand, there is a right use for everything, and he who manufactures or deals in those articles which the more readily lend themselves to the indulgence of vanity is not necessarily bound to know or inquire into the motives which prompt their purchase or use. For example—to put it concretely—would it not be the height of folly for a Christian dealer in, or manufacturer of, mirrors, to discontinue his business because, forsooth, some foolish girl has her head turned by the charm of her beauty displayed in one of his glasses? Certainly. Neither the insensate glass nor the moral agent, the dealer, should be held responsible for the action, but the silly maid herself. This illustrates a principle of very wide application. The acts of another do not necessarily determine the moral quality of a Christian's acts. CHARLES H. HARRISON.

2. In the case of a husband and wife, childless, deciding to adopt a child, and having no special preference as to sex or social condition, what considerations should regulate their choice in the matter?

Two things must be considered in answering this question—God's will and our own. The natural tendency of any one in choosing a child to take to heart and home, would be to find one as morally, mentally and physically healthy and beautiful as possible. And closely, you can easily tell whether or not you can win the child's love and confidence. 4. Should you wish to adopt a child that has been in an institution, inquire of the superintendent as to the child's habits, traits of character, and whether it has a kind disposition. C. H. SCHNEPEL.

3. Name an occasion when the Bible was displaced by gloves?

Philip and Mary were married and came to London 1554. The public places were decorated, and the conduit in Gracechurch street was nicely painted. These paintings represented nine worthies, also Henry VIII. and Edward VI. Henry VIII. was represented with a Bible, on which was written the words Verbum Dei, i. e., "the Word of God." The Bishop of Winchester noticed the Book in Henry's hand. Upon summoning the painter, he called him a traitor, because he had painted Henry with the Book in his hand, and threatened to send him to prison. The painter apologized. Shortly after this he painted Henry again, but instead of the Bible, he painted him holding a pair of gloves in his hand. C. H. S.

4. Why did Job wish that his adversary had written a book (Job 31: 35)?

The rendering of the Revised Version seems to remove the obscurity of the passage. The "words of Job" are about to end with a sweeping denial of the guilt laid to his charge.

they knew God's ways and they were sure that the innocent were always favored and protected by God. The reader has been let into the secret in the first and second chapters, but neither Job nor his friends knew anything about that strange assembly when Satan presented himself among "the Sons of God." The possibility of the suffering being a test, to prove to Satan that Job was disinterested in serving God, never occurred to his friends; so in order to vindicate God from the charge of being unjust, they contend that in some way known to God, but not known to the world, Job had committed heinous sin. No man can answer so vague a charge; so Job says he wishes he had the specifications of the crimes. If his friends are right in their assumption, that none suffer as he does but the guilty, he would like to know what were the charges that had been brought against him. "Oh, that mine adversary had written a book!" ROBERT WYNN.

5. What characteristics render leprosy an appropriate type of sin?

As leprosy is the worst form of disease, it was fixed upon by God to be the especial type of sin, and the injunctions regarding it had reference to its typical character. It was (1) hereditary; (2) contagious; (3) ever tending to increase; (4) incurable except by the power of God; (5) a shame and disgrace; (6) unclean. As a leper was compelled to separate himself from the company of others, so sin separates the soul from God, producing spiritual death; unfitting it forever for heaven and the company of the holy, and insuring its eternal banishment as polluted and abominable. Some, as they look on infancy, reject with horror the thought that sin exists within. But so might anyone say who looked upon the beautiful babe in the arms of a leprosy mother. But time brings forth the fearful malady. New-born babes of leprosy parents are often as pretty and as healthy in appearance as any; but by and by its presence and workings become visible in some of the signs described in the thirteenth chapter of Leviticus. J. A. V. PIETERS.

Leprosy has five striking characteristics which renders it an appropriate type of sin. 1. Its pollution. As the body of one afflicted with leprosy is a mass of unclean, corrupt, decaying flesh, so the soul afflicted by sin is defiled, infected and polluted. 2. Its transmission. Leprosy is often due to inherited taint, so sin "visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation" (Ex. 20: 5). 3. Its propagation. The disease, as it manifested itself among the Jews, was regarded as very contagious. This gave rise to the sad separation of the lepers from their fellow-men: Sin with its harmful influences is communicable also, and leads eventually to the separation of the sinner from the saint. 4. Its development. Leprosy begins with little pain, goes on its slow but sure course until it mutilates the body, disfigures the features, deforms the limbs and organs and makes its prey a helpless wreck. Sin, in a small and apparently insignificant way at first, commences its work in man, but its progress is sure and it leaves its despairing victim an eternal ruin. 5. Its incurability. When the disease has once become deep-seated, no human skill can produce a remedy, and the last faint hope of the unfortunate is that God will perform a miracle, as he has done in the past, and cure him. Sin in the heart cannot be eradicated by human efforts, but God, by his greatest miracle, can purify and make whole the sin-polluted soul. FREDERICK H. BATES.

The Best Book for the Young Sailor

The letter of Ethel G. (published in our issue of January 16) has already begun to awaken interest among the members of the widely-distributed CHRISTIAN HERALD family, and many answers are now coming in. It will be remembered that Ethel G. in her letter said:

I have an unconverted brother in the Navy. Send him something that will help to save him. He is bright and handsome. Mama would not mind his losing his life for his country so much if he did not lose his soul, too. Pick out the book yourself and ask God to help you choose it. He has a Bible, a Testament and a Hymn-book.

The question is, what book would be most likely to be the most serviceable to him? We invited free suggestions. A book has already been presented, but in order to induce our readers to give the matter careful and prayerful consideration, we agreed to send, for the first answer received in which the choice coincided with the book already sent, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, bound in genuine smooth calf, and lined with moire silk, and to the two next best answers, not making the same selection, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, bound in genuine seal, with calf lining. No answers to be received after February 1.

Of the large number of answers received we have only been able to classify those that came by the first mail after the paper reached our readers' hands. They are given below:

Pilgrim's Progress	45	In His Steps	14
Red Letter Testament	6	Life of D. L. Moody	4
Imitation of Christ	4	The Way to God	4
Golden Treasury	2	Prince of House of David	2

The following received one vote each: "St. Elmo," "Barriers Burned Away," "Come to Jesus," "Heaven" (by Moody), Bible Dictionary, "As It Is To Be," "Call to the Unconverted," "Doddridge's Rise and Progress," "Way of Life" (Talmage), "Titus," "Christian Secret of a Happy Life," "Daily Light," "Faithful Promises" (Macduff), "Basket of Barley Loaves," "Christian's Daily Text-Book," "How to Become a Christian," "Ben Hur," "With Christ at Sea," "All of Grace" (Spurgeon), "The Anxious Inquirer," "With Christ in the School of Prayer" (Murray), "Grace and Truth," "A Knight of the Nineteenth Century," D. L. Moody's "Year Book," "Life and Letters of General Thomas J. Jackson," "Absolute Surrender" (Murray), "The Secret of Guidance" (Meyer), "Intra Muros," (A Dream of Heaven).

The further list of preferences will be classified and published later in THE MAIL-BAG.

for what reasons? They will require less shaping in order to develop into companions and ornaments to home and society, and will require less trouble and responsibility on the part of adopted parent or guardian. On the other hand, God has wrapped up grand possibilities in these little immoral, degraded, half-starved bundles of humanity, which, as they are, seem so repulsive. Shall the true man or woman let them go, or shall he pick them up, straighten them out, where the weakness is—strengthen, and where the true gold is found, keep it bright. Christ was not particular, where opportunity offered he adopted a blind beggar into his family as quickly as he did a Saul. Hence one must be guided by God's will as well as his own, for it may decide the child's eternal as well as earthly destiny. MARY F. EMMETT.

1. Consider the parents, inquire about their health, habits and disposition; for we find that children inherit certain inclinations from their parents. 2. In adopting a baby of say two to six months old, this second point will not hold good; otherwise, if the child should be about three to six years of age, inquire whether he is easily provoked, whether he is inclined to disobedience. 3. So sure is he of his innocence, and of a judicial vindication by Jehovah, that he wishes that his adversary had written a book (indictment R. V.) that he might specifically answer it over his own signature (mark or seal). He declares that if he had such an indictment with his sealed answer he would bind it upon his shoulder that it might be seen of all men, and that he would wear it as a crown of dignity and a vindication of his righteousness before Jehovah and "present it to him," (margin R. V.) CHARLES H. HARRISON.

The purpose of the book of Job is to break down the cruel doctrine, which persists to this day, that trial and suffering are punishment for sin. Job's friends, accepting the doctrine, as it is easy for the outsider to do, contend that he must have been a very great sinner, otherwise he would not have been so great a sufferer. "Remember, I pray thee," says Eliphaz, "who ever perished, being innocent." His life was so blameless and beneficent, that sin in his case implied hypocrisy. In the language of our day, they charged him with leading a double life. But they could not specify the form of his wickedness. They merely assumed it from the fact of his suffering. They intimated, as so many people still do, that

OUR GRAIN AND BLANKETS IN INDIA

CAMELS BEARING AMERICAN CORN AND BLANKETS TO THE VILLAGES OF INDIA

FROM Dr. J. H. McNeill of Dohad, India, two photographs have come by the last mail, which will interest our readers. They were taken soon after the Quito reached Bombay, laden with the grain sent by the compassionate friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to feed the starving people of India. One of them, reproduced in the centre of this page, shows the people of that famine-stricken town receiving their share of the corn. The other, at the head of the page, shows the procession of camels bearing the life-giving food and blankets to the villages far inland. It is gratifying to learn that after Dr. Klopsch's visit to Dohad, and his report to the Government of India of the conditions he found there, a decided improvement took place. Dr. Klopsch's protests against the management were found to be well-founded, and reforms were immediately instituted. Dr. Klopsch's arrangements for the protection of the poor sufferers from the inclemency of the weather, were also justified by the results. Mr. Robert Ward writes, that the people who thronged his compound were allowed to take their choice either of a blanket or of its equivalent in food or money. Without an exception, they all chose the blanket, thus showing that the provision for their comfort was wisely made and heartily appreciated. Each blanket bore the inscription: "Sent by the Christians of America, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to save the lives of India's suffering people." Mr. Ward says: "Accustomed as I am to emergency work in India, I never witnessed such heartfelt gratitude as those people displayed, when they wrapped over their poor threadbare rags one of these blankets." Besides this, the weaving of the blankets had benefited the poor weavers, who suffered equally with the agricultural class from the famine. The beneficence was thus doubly blessed, providing the weavers with the money for food, while the product of their looms covered the naked, shivering people who were sleeping on the bare ground, and thus saved them from perishing of chills and fever. The contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund have thus the satisfaction of knowing that their gifts were twice blessed. Our readers will be glad to know that our appeals on behalf of the poor little orphan children of India are meeting with a hearty response from the great heart of the American people. Sunday Schools, Young People's Societies and individual Christians are sending by every mail pledges of adoption. There is now no doubt that the whole five thousand children for whose support we pleaded will be adopted, and will be sheltered and educated through the generosity of our readers, and the readers of other journals which have cheerfully printed our appeal. This is intensely gratifying—a matter for most devout thankfulness to the God of the fatherless. Our reports to the missionaries announcing that this and that boy or girl in their care have been adopted as the patrons indicated their preference according to denomination, age and sex, have gladdened the hearts of these devoted men and women who, having accepted the charge of these children in faith, were concerned about their ability to provide for them, but now find that God has honored their faith, and they too give to him joyful thanksgiving. They are now going cheerfully to work preparing to train the children, not only to be Christian men and women preaching by their lives the glorious power of the Christian religion, but teaching them practical ways of earning a livelihood, so that they may grow up to be self-supporting men and women, who will be honored in their several communities as skilled, capable, useful citizens.

Dr. Harpster, the eminent missionary at Guntur, writes us* that he has taken special care that the stigma of charity shall never attach to any of the famine orphans in his charge, and that other missionaries are doing likewise. They are being treated on precisely the same footing as are the children of wealthy natives now in the schools, who are being educated at the expense of their parents. The orphans have the same food and the same attention as the other pupils. Miss Lillian Dietrich, who is in charge of the orphanage at Cawnpore, writes us that the two hundred girls under her care are being trained to habits of industry and economy, and are being prepared with discrimination as to their character for positions of usefulness, while, above all, they are taught to know and love Christ. Their ages vary from three years old to sixteen, and the older ones are glad to aid in taking charge of the younger. A Christian Endeavor Society has been organized in the institution, and Miss Dietrich and her colleagues have been surprised and delighted by the intelligence and enthusiasm the children have manifested in the work. Miss A. A. Brown, of the Kholapur Mission, writes: "It would do you good to see the bright, happy faces of the waifs who have been saved from starvation by the contributions of your readers. We have now over five hundred of these children under our care. Some of them are child-widows, whose lot would have been especially sad if we had not sheltered them. The girls are learning sewing and domestic work, and the boys are being taught better methods of farming, mason and carpenter work. They are all wonderfully bright and willing to learn." Other missionaries send most encouraging reports of the children under their care, and all unite in thanks to the friends in America, whose compassion for the orphans have placed the opportunity of training them for Christ within their reach.

ORPHANS IN THE ORPHANAGE AT CAWNPORE PREPARING A MEAL

ABLUTIONS FOR NEW ARRIVALS IN THE ORPHANAGE AT CAWNPORE

SUCCESSFUL CHRISTIAN WORK

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

Matt. 4: 21: "James the Son of Zebedee, and John his brother, in a ship with Zebedee their father, mending their nets."

I GO a-fishing," cried Simon Peter to his comrades, and the most of the Apostles had hands hard from fishing tackle. The fisheries of the world have always attracted attention. In the third century the Queen of Egypt had for pin-money four hundred and seventy thousand dollars received from the fisheries of Lake Moeris. And if the time should ever come when the immensity of the world's population could not be fed by the vegetables and meats of the land, the sea has an amount of animal life that would feed all the populations of the earth, and fatten them with a food that by its phosphorus would make a generation brainy and intellectual beyond anything that the world has ever imagined. My text takes us among the Galilean fishermen. One day Walter Scott, while hunting in an old drawer, found among some old fishing tackle the manuscript of his immortal book, Waverley, which he had put away there as of no worth, and who knows but that to-day we may find some unknown wealth of thought while looking at the fishing tackle in the text.

It is not a good day for fishing, and three men are in the boat repairing the broken fishing nets. If you are fishing with a hook and line, and the fish will not bite, it is a good time to put the angler's apparatus into better condition. Perhaps the last fish you hauled in was so large that something snapped. Or, if you were fishing with a net, there was a mighty floundering of the scales or an exposed nail on the side of the boat which broke some of the threads, and let part or all of the captives of the deep escape into their natural element. And hardly anything is more provoking than to nearly land a score or a hundred of trophies from the deep, and when you are in the full glee of hauling in the spotted treasures, through some they splash into the wave. That is too much of a trial of patience for most fishermen to endure, and many a man ordinarily correct of speech, in such circumstances comes to an intensity of utterance unjustifiable. Therefore, no good fisherman considers the time wasted that is spent in mending his net. Now, the Bible again and again represents Christian workers as fishers of men, and we are all sweeping through the sea of humanity some kind of a net. Indeed, there have been enough nets out and enough fishermen busy to have landed the whole human race in the kingdom of God long before this. What is the matter? The Gospel is all right, and it has been a good time for catching souls for thousands of years. Why, then, the failures? The trouble is with the nets, and most of them need to be mended. I propose to show you what is the matter with most of the nets, and how to mend them. In the text, old Zebedee and his two boys, James and John, were doing a good thing when they sat in the boat mending their nets.

The trouble with many of our nets is that the meshes are too large. If a fish can get his gills and half his body through the network, he tears and rends and works his way out, and leaves the place through which he squirmed a tangle of broken threads. In our desire to make everything so easy we relax, we loosen, we widen. We let men after they are once in the Gospel net escape into the world, and go into indulgences and swim all around Galilee, from north side to south side, and from east side to west side, expecting that they will come back again. We ought to make it easy for them to get into the kingdom of God, and, as far as we can, make it impossible for them to get out. The poor advice nowadays to many is: "Go and do just as you did before you were captured for God and heaven. The net was not intended to be any restraint or any hindrance. What you did before you were a Christian do now. Go to all styles of amusement, read all the styles of books, engage in all the styles of behavior as before you were converted." And so, through these meshes of permission and laxity they wriggle out, through this opening and that opening, tearing the net as they go, and soon all the souls that we expected to land in heaven, before we know it are back in the deep sea of the world. Oh, when we go a-Gospel-fishing, let us make it as easy as possible for souls to get in, and as hard as possible to get out.

Plenty of Sea-room

Is the Bible language an unmeaning verbiage when it talks about self-denial, and keeping the body under, and about walking the narrow way, and entering the strait gate, and about carrying the cross? Is there to be no way of telling whether a man is a Christian except by his taking the communion chalice on sacramental day? May a man be as reckless about his thoughts, about his words, about his temper, about his amusements, after conversion as before. Alas, the words of Christ are so little heeded when he said: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me cannot be my disciple." The Church is fast becoming as bad as the world, and when it gets as bad as the world, it will be worse than the world by so much, as it will add hypocrisy of a most appalling kind to its other defects.

Furthermore, many of our nets are torn to pieces by being entangled with other nets. It is a sad sight to see fishermen fighting about sea-room, and pulling in opposite directions each to get his net, both nets damaged by the struggle and losing all the fish. In this land, where there are more than seventy million people, there are at least thirty million not in the Sunday Schools and churches. In such an Atlantic Ocean of opportunity, there is room for all the nets and all the boats and all the fishermen and for millions more. There should be no rivalry between churches. Each one does a work peculiar to itself. But there are cities in this country where there is now going on an awful ripping and rending and tearing of fishing-nets. Indeed, all over Christendom at this time there is a great war going on between fishermen, ministers against ministers.

Distracting Quarrels

Now I have noticed a man cannot fish and fight at the same time. He either neglects his net or his musket. It is amazing how much time some of the fishermen have to look after other fishermen. It is more than I can do to take care of my own net. You see the wind is just right, and it is such a good time for fishing, and the fish are coming in so rapidly that I have to keep my eye and hand busy. There are about two hundred million souls wanting to get into the kingdom of God, and it will require all the nets and all the fishermen of Christendom to safely land them. Oh, brethren of the ministry! Let us spend our time in fishing instead of fighting. But if I angrily jerk my net across your net, and you jerk your net angrily across mine, we will soon have two broken nets and no fish. The French Revolution nearly destroyed the French fisheries, and ecclesiastical war is the worst thing possible while hauling souls into the kingdom. My friends, I notice in the text that James the son of Zebedee and John his brother were busy not mending somebody else's nets, but mending their own nets, and I rather think that we who are engaged in Christian work in this opening century will require all our spare time to mend our own nets. God help us in the duty!

In this work of repair we need to put into the nets more threads of common sense. When we can present religion as a great practicality we will catch a hundred souls where now we catch one. Present religion as an intellectuality and we will fail. Out in the fisheries there are set across the waters what are called gill nets, and the fish put their heads through the meshes and then cannot withdraw them, because they are caught by the gills. But gill nets cannot be of any service in religious work. Men are never caught for the truth by their heads; it is by the heart or not at all. No argument ever saved a man and no keen analysis ever brought a man into the kingdom of God. Heart work, not head work. Away with your gill nets! Sympathy, helpfulness, consolation, love, are the names of some of the threads that we need to weave in our gospel nets when we are mending them.

Do you know that the world's heart is bursting with trouble, and if you could make that world believe that the religion of Jesus Christ is the whole world would surrender to-morrow, yea, would surrender this hour. The day before James A. Garfield was inaugurated as President, I was in the cars going from Richmond to Washington. A gentleman seated near to me in the cars knew me, and we were soon in familiar conversation. It was just after a bereavement, and I was speaking to him from an over-burdened heart about the sorrow I was suffering. Looking at his cheerful face, I said: "I guess you have escaped all trouble. I should judge from your countenance that you have come through free from all misfortune." Then he looked at me with a look I shall never forget, and whispered in my ear: "Sir, you know nothing about trouble. My wife has been in an insane asylum for fifteen years." And then he turned and looked out of the window and into the night with a silence I was too overpowered to break. That was another illustration of the fact that no one escapes trouble. Why, that man seated next to you in church has on his soul a weight compared with which a mountain is a feather. That woman seated next to you in church has a grief the recital of which would make your body, mind and soul shudder.

When you are mending your net for this wide, deep sea of humanity, take out that wire thread of criticism and that horse-hair thread of harshness and put in a soft silken thread of Christian sympathy. Yea, when you are mending your nets tear out those old threads of gruffness and weave in a few and geniality. In the house of God let all Christian faces beam with a look that means welcome. Say "Good morning" to the stranger as he enters your pew, and at the close shake hands with him and say, "How did you like the music?" Why, you would be to that man a panel of the door of heaven; you would be to him a note of the doxology that seraphs sing when a new soul enters heaven. I have in other days entered a pew in church and the woman at the other end of the pew looked at me as much as to say: "How dare you? This is my pew and I pay the rent for it!" Well, I crouched in the other corner and made myself as small as possible and felt as though I had been stealing something. So there are people who have a sharp edge to their religion, and they act as though they thought most people had been elected to be damned and they were glad of it. Oh, let us brighten up our manner and appear in gentlemanliness or ladyhood.

The object in fly-fishing is to throw the fly far out, and then let it drop gently down and keep it gently rising and falling with the waters, and not plunge it like a man-of-war's anchor; and abruptness and harshness of manner must be avoided in our attempt at usefulness. I know a man in New York who is more sunny and genial when he has dyspepsia than when he is not suffering from that depressing trouble. I have found out his secret. When he starts out in the morning with such depression, he asks for special grace to keep from snapping up anybody that day, and puts forth additional determination to be kindly and genial, and by the help of God he accomplishes it. Many of our nets need to be mended in these respects, the black threads and the rough threads taken out, and the bright threads and the golden threads of Christian geniality woven in.

In addition to this, we need to mend our nets with more

Threads of Patience

It is no rare thing for a fisherman to spend one whole day before he can take a St. Lawrence pike, or an Ohio salmon, or a Long Island pickerel, or a Cayuga black bass, or a Delaware cat-fish, and he does that day after day without particular discouragement. But what a lack of patience if we do not immediately succeed in soul-catching. We are apt to give it up and say: "I will never try again." Into all our nets we need to weave all along the edge, and all through the centre, great, long, stout threads of Christian patience. How patient God has been with us! Can we not be patient with our fellows?

Again, in mending our nets we need also to put in the threads of faith and tear out all the tangled meshes of unbelief. Our work is successful according to our faith. The man who believes in only half a Bible, or the Bible in spots; the man who thinks he cannot persuade others; the man who halts, doubting about this and doubting about that, will be a failure in Christian work. Show me the man who rather thinks that the Garden of Eden may have been an allegory, and is not quite certain but that there may be another chance after death, and does not know whether or not the Bible is inspired, and I tell you that man for soul-saving is a poor stick. Faith in God and in Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost, and the absolute necessity of a regenerated heart, in order to see God in peace, is one thread you must have in your mended net, or you will never be a successful fisher for men. Why, how can you doubt? The rottenest thread to tear out of your net is unbelief, and the most important thread that you are to put in it is faith. Faith in God, triumphant faith, everlasting faith.

Oh, this important work of mending our nets! If we could get our nets right we would accomplish more in soul-saving in the next year than we have in the last twenty years. But

Where Shall We Get Them Mended?

Just where the old fisherman, Zebedee and his two boys mended their nets—where you are. James and John had no time to go ashore. They were not fishing for fun, as you and I do in summer time. It was their livelihood and that of their families. They mended their nets where they were—in the ship. "Oh," says some one, "I mean to get my net mended, and I will go down to the public library, and I will see what the scientists say about evolution and about the 'survival of the fittest,' and I will read up what the theologians say about 'advanced thought.' I will leave the ship awhile, and I will go ashore and stay there till my net is mended." Do that, my brother, and you will have no net left. Instead of their helping you mend your net, they will steal the pieces that remain. Better stay in the Gospel boat, where you have all the means for mending your net. What are they, do you ask? I answer all you need you have where you are; namely, a Bible and a place to pray. The more you study evolution and adopt that is called advanced thought, the more useless you will be. Stay in the ship and mend your net. That is where James, the son of Zebedee, and John, his brother, stayed. That is where all who get their nets mended stay.

Deserting the Ship

I notice that all who leave the Gospel boat and go ashore to mend their nets stay there. Or if they try again to fish, they do not catch anything. Get out of the Gospel boat and go up into the world to get your net mended, and you will live to the day when you will feel like the man who, having forsaken Christianity, sighed "I would give a thousand pounds to feel I did in 1820." The time will come when you would be willing to give a thousand pounds to feel as you did in 1901. These men who have given up their religion cannot help you a bit.

These dear brethren of all denominations, afflicted with theological fidgets, had better go to mending nets instead of seeking them. Before they break up the religion and try to foist on us a new religion, let them go through some great crucible for God that will prove them worthy for such a work, taking the advice of Talleyrand to a man who wanted to set the religion of Jesus Christ and start a new one, when he said: "Go and be crucified and then raise yourself from the grave the third day!" Those who propose to mend their nets by secular and sceptical books are like a man who has just one week for fishing, and six of the days he spends in reading Isaak Walton's Compleat Angler, and Wheatley's Rod and Line, and Scott's Fishing in Northern Waters, and Pullman's Vade Mecum of Fly-Fishing for Trout, and then on Saturday morning, his last day out, goes to the river to ply his art; but that day the fish will not bite, and late on Saturday night he goes to his home with empty basket. Alas! alas! If when the Saturday night of our life drops on us, it shall be found that we have spent our time in the libraries of worldly philosophy, trying to mend our nets, and we have only a few souls to report as brought to God through our instrumentality, while some humble Gospel fisherman, his library made up of a Bible and an almanac, shall come home laden with the results, his trophies all the souls within fifteen miles of his log cabin meeting-house.

A Famous Fisherman

In the time of great disturbance in Naples in 1649, Massaniello, a bare-footed fishing-boy, dropped his fishing-rod, and by strange magnetism took command of that city of six hundred thousand souls. He took off his fishing-jacket and put on a robe of gold in the presence of howling mobs. He put his hand on his lip as a signal and they were silent. He waved his hand away from him and they retired to their homes. Armies passed in review before him. He became the nation's idol. The rapid rise and complete supremacy of that young fisherman, Massaniello, has no parallel in all history. But something equal to that and better than that is an every-day occurrence in heaven. God takes some of those, who in this world were fishers of men, and who toiled very humbly, but because of the way they mended their nets and employed their nets after they were mended, he suddenly hoists them and robes them and sceptres them and crowns them, and makes them rulers over many cities, and he marches armies of saved ones before them in review, Massaniellos unhonored on earth but radiated in heaven. The fisher-boy of Naples soon lost his power, but those people of God who have kept their nets mended and rightly swung them shall never lose their exalted place, but shall reign forever and ever and ever. Keep that reward in sight.

But do not spend your time fishing with hook and line. Why did not James the son of Zebedee sit on the wharf at Cana, his feet hanging over the lake, and with a long pole and a worm on the hook dipped into the wave wait for some mullet to swim up and be caught. Why did not Zebedee spend his afternoon trying to catch one eel? No, that work was too slow. These men were not mending a hook and line, they were mending their nets. So let the church of God not be content with having here one soul and next month another soul brought into the kingdom.

Sweep all the Seas with Nets, scoop nets, seine nets, drag nets, all-encompassing nets, and take the treasures in by hundreds and thousands and millions, and nations will be born in a day, and the hemispheres quake with the tread of a ransoming God. Do you know what will be the two most tremendous hours in our heavenly existence? Among the quadrillions of ages which shall roll on, what two occasions will be to us the greatest? The day of our arrival there will be to us one of the two greatest. The second greatest, I think, will be the day when we shall have put in parallel lines before us what Christ did for us, and what we did for Christ, the one so great, the other so little. That will be the only embarrassment in heaven. My Lord and my God! What will we do and what will we say when, on one side are placed the Saviour's great sacrifices for us, and our small sacrifices for him; his exile, his humiliation, his agonies on one hand, and our poor, weak, insufficient sacrifices on the other. To make the contrast less overwhelming let us quickly mend our nets, and, like the Galilean fishermen, may we be divinely helped to cast them on the right side of the ship.

TRAINING ARMENIA'S ORPHANS TO SELF-SUPPORT

AS the great majority of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are aware, this journal has, for several years past, supported a large number of Armenian children, who, through famine and massacre, became orphaned and homeless and destitute. These orphans are now under the care of our good missionaries, Mr. Drumm, at Harput; Miss Corinna Shattuck, at Orfa; Mr. Dewey, at Maragha; and Dr. Lynolds, Van. Acknowledgment of the regular remittances forwarded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the support, education and industrial training of the children, these missionaries invariably send letters giving encouraging news of the progress of their little charges.

The orphans are doing well in their classes; some equipped with making a living are already in the big world at work; others are rapidly developing along lines which promise great usefulness. A few years hence, some who entered the orphanage at the various places named as helpless, friendless waifs, will go forth in turn as messengers of God's love and mercy.

In his latest letter, Rev. Mr. Dewey,

WEAVING RUGS

AN ARMENIAN GIRL SPINNING

writing from the Mission at Mardin, after expressing his pleasure at the receipt of a check for the support of the orphans, says:

"I send you two pictures, showing several of our children at work, as your readers may be pleased to see how some of their little beneficiaries are occupied. The chance visit of a photographer with a camera larger than that of Mrs. Thorn, our Mission artist, enabled us to get a few pictures of satisfactory size. We have just received two new boys, and are expecting two new girls in a few days. Although, of course, the time for taking in famine orphans and orphans by massacre is past, there are applicants yet whom we cannot in conscience refuse." In one picture, as will be observed, two orphan girls are weaving rugs. Their instructor stands behind the rude wooden loom, with a bunch of the colored yarn they use in his left hand. A completed portion of the work shows under the extended hands of the girls. In another picture, where an orphan girl sits spinning, the clumsy native wheel shows at her left.

Miss Corinna Shattuck, while in this country, succeeded in making arrangements for beginning an extensive industrial work at the Orfa Mission, her object being to teach our boys and girls useful trades. The progress of her experiment will be described in letters from herself. A large business firm in Belfast, Ireland, has already contracted for enough work on handkerchiefs to keep 500 embroiderers occupied. Mrs. George M. Adams, 93 Hancock Street, Auburndale, Mass., will give information to any American friends concerning the portieres, cushions, bags, etc., made by the widows and orphans at the Mission, and will forward any orders that may be given to Miss Shattuck. Our readers will watch the progress of these industrial experiments with the deepest interest.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

R. E. M., Tenn., writes:

I had trouble that seemed greater than I could bear, but I went to Jesus and prayed and laid my burden at his feet. I praise his holy name for his goodness, for he has answered the petition of his servant.

C. S., College Bird, Port au Prince, Hayti, writes:

Our "Answered Prayers" came under my notice for the first time, just when a burden of prayer was on my heart for one of our girls who seemed really oppressed of an evil spirit. I pleaded with God to change her heart, and now I thankfully acknowledge God's mercy to her, for my prayer is answered.

Mrs. D. W. H., Albuquerque, New Mexico, writes:

Many times have I to thank my Heavenly Father for direct answer to prayer; many times has he brought light out of darkness.

Reader, Grandview, Tex., writes:

In hope of helping some who may be slow to believe, I write. I have passed through so many trials and had so many answers to prayer, that it would take a large volume to record them all. "At thy burden upon the Lord and he shall sustain thee."

Mrs. J. F. S., Bunceton, Mo., writes:

I want to add my testimony. I know God answers prayer. So many of my prayers have been answered that I know he is a loving Father and will always give us what is for our eternal good.

Mother and daughter, Caithersburg, Md., write:

We had a severe trial and God heard our petition and part of that trouble has passed away. But another has come. We have so many trials, but God has turned them away or given us strength to bear them. May the loving God who sees our case do so again. We have so much sorrow—at times almost despair. Sometimes we pray nearly all night. We can say God is good; he doeth all things well.

K. S., U. S. Marine Hospital, San Francisco, Cal., writes:

Noticing your column of answered prayers in one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALDS left in the Marine Hospital, where I am, I wish to give you my experience. Three months ago I fell nearly one hundred feet from the yard of a vessel, crushing my left leg from the knee to the ankle. Through my mother's prayers, my own prayers, and the prayers of friends, I feel that my life has been preserved. Please send me a copy of your paper containing this that I may send it to my mother. She will be so glad to see it.

A Mother, Titusville, writes:

I have been troubled in regard to an absent son. I have been praying for him and praying that I might hear from him. I have heard and I know my prayer has been answered.

L. A. S., Vermont, writes:

I give thanks and praise to God for his answer to my prayer in marvelously blessing two households. I was greatly burdened and made my request urgent. Meanwhile, God gave me grace to cling to his promise: "If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you."

M. P., Crow Wing, Minn., writes:

Having read so many answers to prayer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I felt encouraged and besought God to lead me safely through a great trial that was before me. He heard my prayer.

J. W. R., Littleton, N. H., writes:

Having read the answers to prayers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I was encouraged to more faithful prayer for help in my trouble. God heard and answered my prayer, and I praise him from a grateful heart.

Reader, Birmingham, N. Y., writes.

I besought God to carry my dear one safely through a great danger. He heard and answered my prayer. I prayed him to help me. He heard and answered.

E., Fitchburg, Mass., writes:

For long years I have known, having proved it over and over again, that God hears and answers prayer. But lately, just lately, I have had another assurance of it. I prayed for the salvation of a dear one gone astray, and a letter came assuring me that God is answering that petition. Faint hearts take courage: God hears, God answers, his believing children.

F. W. H., Creagerstown, Md., writes:

I had very dark clouds overshadowing me and it seemed that my whole life was to be blasted; but I went to God in earnest prayer and my petitions have been answered, the clouds have scattered and I give God thanks.

Letters acknowledging answers to prayer have also been received from Mrs. J. S., Magnolia, Ia.; M. E. B., Eureka Springs, Ark.; Mrs. T., Providence, R. I.; A. L., New York; L. M., New York; M. S., Fort Wayne, Ind.; H. R., Indiana; Mrs. J. N., Onawa, Ia.; J. J. W., Donaldsonville, Ga.; W. S. P., Eugene, Ore.; K. A. P., St. Louis, Mo.

The Great Revival in the Town of TARKIO, MO.....

• A • TOWN • TAKEN • FOR • CHRIST •

...An Authentic Account by the Leading Pastors

FEW revivals in recent years have attracted more attention than that which took place recently at Tarkio, Mo. As many conflicting reports have appeared concerning it, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has obtained from the ministers of Tarkio themselves, through an authorized committee, an account of the actual facts connected with this extraordinary manifestation of Divine power, working in the hearts of an entire community, and leading many hundreds to seek salvation and peace at the Cross. The statement of the Ministers' Association is given below:

Tarkio is a town of some two thousand souls, situated in the extreme northwest corner of the State of Missouri. It is in the heart of what is perhaps the greatest corn-raising and stock-feeding belt in the world, and is surrounded by large ranches. Tarkio has always had a strong moral and religious sentiment. Its leading business men have been earnest Christians. It has five churches—the Baptist, Christian, Methodist, Presbyterian, and United Presbyterian, and it also has a college under the control of the United Presbyterian Church, maintained largely by the liberality of Mr. David Rankin, one of the cattle kings of the world. The five churches bore on their rolls some twelve hundred names.

It was in the month of June that these five pastors extended an invitation to Evangelist M. B. Williams and his singer and helper, Mr. Charles Alexander, to lead a series of Gospel meetings, from which it was earnestly hoped that genuine revival might result. About the first of October twelve hundred covenant prayer-cards were given out to the members of the churches, and about six hundred of these were signed and returned. This meant that about six hundred people had solemnly covenanted to pray daily for the blessing of God to come with power upon the town and community. During September, an evangelist conducted special meetings in the Christian Church. In October, Evangelist Mrs. Edith L. Peake led special meetings in the United Presbyterian Church. After this, Mr. S. D. Gordon, Chairman of the Ohio Evangelization Movement, gave a number of addresses to students and others who came to hear him on "Spiritual Power." None of these efforts were successful in bringing large numbers to an open confession of the Christ, but they aroused the Christian people of the community. Every night for two weeks preceding the coming of Evangelist Williams, prayer-meetings were held in a dozen different homes.

On the first Sabbath morning of November, 1900, union meetings were begun under the leadership of the evangelists and their helpers, Miss Fox, Mr. Peck, Mr. Boatman, and Mr. Hamilton. The meetings were held in the Auditorium, located in the business part of Tarkio, having a seating capacity of from one thousand to twelve hundred. Back of the speakers' stand, there was an improvised choir-loft with one hundred and sixty chairs. Here Mr. Alexander arranged his chorus, to which no small part of the success of the meetings was due. For twenty-four days Mr. Williams continued preaching the Gospel every evening, three times on Sabbaths, and about four afternoons would weep with some pathetic tale, and then, while hearts were tender, he exhorted them to "Quit sin and serve God," taking Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour and surrendering all to him. His preaching was always Scriptural and clustered about the great heart-truths of Christianity. Even on the human side, however, the results were not due alone to the preaching. The evangelist fairly drove the Christian people into personal work, and hundreds are thanking him for it to-day. It brought to them a taste of the joys of soul-winning, which can never be forgot-the second week, the evangelist called for a day of fasting and prayer. Friday the second week was appointed. On the morning of that day, at 8.45 o'clock, twenty-five prayer-meetings were held in the homes of the people. From these meetings the people went at 9.30 o'clock to the Auditorium, which was filled, and the evangelist preached. In the afternoon the building was filled again, and again at night. That day was almost as solemn a Sabbath. But little business was done, and the streets were quiet. After the meetings never lagged. There was no more trouble in getting Christian people to speak to their fellows concerning Jesus. Society clubs organized themselves into prayer bands, meeting every afternoon, and the Christian members climbed to spiritual heights before unknown and prayed their unconverted fellows into the kingdom of God. Religion was almost the only topic of conversation and rough men, who had at best been carnal Christians, with tears and prayer upon the streets and in the business places, pleaded with their unconverted friends to accept salvation. Never for a moment was there in the meetings anything that even savored of boisterous excitement. There was, however, a tremendous earnestness born of intelligent gratitude to God for blessings received, and an intelligent anxiety for the unsaved. The evangelist never attempted to secure decision by unfair advantage. He asked those who would surrender to Jesus, and accept him as their personal Saviour, to come to the front, take him by the hand, speak a word for Jesus, and give their names to the secretaries appointed for that purpose, also to name their church preference, if any. There was no room for misunderstanding. No claptrap methods were used. Men were asked to do the manly thing for Christ's sake and they did it. Of the five hundred and sixty-three who professed conversion, three hundred and fifty were men and boys over fifteen years of age.

Some of the visible results of the revival so far, are as follows—First, the money given:

Expenses of various kinds.....	$6
Paid Evangelists and helpers.....	1.9
Raised for Bible Class expenses.....	2
Raised for helping the needy.....	2
Raised for Reading and Prayer-room, down town.....	1
Total.....	$32

All this was freely and gladly given, with the feeling that we had received many times its worth in benefits to the community.

Second, the people reached. Five hundred and sixty-three persons professed conversion, and many others have been stirred to earnest thought concerning their own salvation. Some of these were very young children who will be under our care, and others were already on some church roll, but were practically "dead of each week. Then he was compelled to leave because of another engagement, but Mr. Alexander continued through the fourth week, conducting testimony meetings and strengthening the converts.

The preaching of the evangelist was of a style peculiar to himself. His sermons were seldom less than an hour and a half long. His mingled pathos and humor made people laugh, and then, while they laughed, he poured in the most scathing rebukes to besetting sins. Strong men ten. It compelled many to make confessions and to clean up their lives, in order that they might be able to speak to the unconverted concerning a Saviour. Mr. Alexander excelled, not only as a musical conductor but also as a director of the after-meetings, and the personal workers, Mr. Peck and Miss Fox, were among the most energetic and successful in this personal work with souls.

The meeting seemed to lag during the first week, and then, at the beginning of ber," until revived by the Holy Spirit at the meetings. Nearly four hundred of the rest have now gone into active membership in some church.

Third, the effect on church work. Church membership has increased a little over thirty per cent. in numbers; but its spiritual force has been more than doubled. Attendance at and interest in all church services has increased in a far greater ratio than ever before known in Tarkio. Several churches can hardly provide places for their Sunday School classes, and the Wednesday night prayer meetings look like Sabbath congregations. In Tarkio, the Baptist Church has received forty-two new members; the Christian, seventy-seven; the Presbyterian, twenty-six; the United Presbyterian, twenty-two; the Methodist, one hundred and ten, and others are still coming in nearly every Sabbath.

Fourth, the effect on the community. We have no saloons, and our doctors and druggists have now signed an agreement not to prescribe or sell intoxicating liquor to any one, unless absolutely needed as a medicine. Gambling instruments have been burned, and more than a dozen former drinking men and gamblers are now living sober, straightforward Christian lives, to the great joy of their wives and children. Profanity is rarely heard now, even in the stock-yards, and dancing and card-playing are practically abandoned in respectable society.

But the results are not all negative. The number of homes having family prayer is more than doubled, and eight hundred people have promised to read their Bibles through this year. More than four hundred Bibles have been sold here since the meeting closed. Miss Grace Saxe, who is leading Bible studies in Tarkio, has nearly seven hundred members enrolled in her adult, high school and children's classes, nearly all of whom read over the lesson, frequently containing ten or more chapters, three or more times before each class. Nearly all the stores now have cards in their windows announcing that they will close at 7.30 on Wednesday night, and inviting all to go to prayer-meeting. A men's noonday meeting was started down town before Mr. Alexander left, and still keeps right on every day, with from twenty to forty present at each meeting. Almost a dozen cottage prayer-meetings are also held somewhere in the community every week. A list has been made out of over two hundred people yet unconverted, and every effort is being made by prayer and personal effort to win them to Jesus Christ.

Many old quarrels have been settled, and men who were at variance for years have become friends in Christ. A downtown reading and prayer meeting room, for men especially, is being fitted up, and will be maintained. Then there is a spirit of charity and helpfulness, rather than of criticism, everywhere, with a readiness to help the weak, and to lift up the fallen; and with it all a glow of sunshine and joy, unknown heretofore, on hundreds of faces. Our people are not troubling themselves about the "Judgment Day," but, on the contrary, they have far less fear of it, and far more joy in real living for Christ and their fellow-men, than they ever dreamed of before. Even the unconverted men in the community all acknowledge that great good has been done, and they are glad Mr. Williams was here.

Our pastors and people unitedly and most cordially commend Brothers Williams and Alexander to any people, as evangelists led and blessed of the spirit of God. The 126th Psalm exactly expresses our feelings here. With great thankfulness for what the Lord has done for us, we earnestly hope and pray that many other places may receive a like rich blessing from the presence and power of the Holy Spirit.

STRANGE RITES OF THE WICHITA INDIANS

THE SOLEMN ORDEAL OF THE GHOST DANCE---A DRAWBACK TO INDIAN CIVILIZATION

INDIAN life is many-sided. Optimist and pessimist can find ample proof with which to verify his extreme views of what he believes the Indian to be, the story of one tribe being equally applicable to all, varied only by place. A fair example is cited in the Wichitas, who live on the Wichita Reservation in the eastern part of Oklahoma. Their earliest recorded history dates to 1540, when they were discovered by the Spanish under Coronado. An Indian, who had been hired by the soldiers to guide them on a buffalo hunt, betrayed them, by leading the army on by his stories to a supposed El Dorado, which proved to be an Indian village of grass houses, the homes of the Wichita Indians. These are the only Indians who make and live in grass houses. They are an agricultural tribe. They prepare the dry corn for food by grinding it between stones. They also raise great crops of squashes, which they cut into strips and dry for winter food. In every garden there is a melon-patch. They are a peace-loving people. Among them are some Indians who have tried to keep up with the march of civilization, and others who cling tenaciously to the superstitions and bits of the past. Indian dances are serious drawbacks to the civilization of Indians. One very warm

The dancers kept it up till it seemed they must drop dead from sunstroke or sheer exhaustion. The medicine men went in and about the dancers, blowing upon this or that one to keep off the evil spirits, stamping upon the ground and waving the hands before the eyes or behind the head of some dancer. The person thus noticed would become greatly excited, shaking and swaying till a final stamp upon the ground by the foot of the medicine man could not be resisted, and then the dancer would fall over in a trance, lying upon his back, with the broiling sun shining full upon his face.

One dancer after another, mostly women, dropped upon the earth amidst the noise, crying in an apparent tumult, though doubtless to the devotees of this religious performance every sign and motion was full of meaning.

Those lying in trances were unnoticed and undisturbed. Suddenly the unconscious one would sit up, fully awake, and tell of wonderful messages from the spirits of departed friends. Others got up from the ground unconcernedly and danced again. Tewaconi Jim, the chief, did not dance, but stood in a wagon talking continually in a very loud tone, evidently preaching. Nearby some women were busy preparly during the past summer when the thermometer registered 94° in the shade, it was rumored that the Wichitas were going to give a dance, that was to be both a war-dance and a ghost-dance. As the camps were approached, a voice called attention toward one of the grass houses, and from the enclosure came forth a company of at least fifty Indians, painted and dressed most gorgeously, with feathers and other Indian finery waving on the breeze as they came galloping on their ponies, two by two, hooting and yelling. The women and those about the camps began wailing and mourning, while at the foot of the hill was a group of Indians, painted and dressed in a similar barbaric fashion, and singing, while six men, who sat on the ground around a big drum, beat it most vigorously. Those on horseback rode 'round and 'round in gradually decreasing circles, till they came to a stop in front of the group awaiting their arrival. Jumping from their ponies they stood facing the sun, and all joined in the singing. After this first song, it was repeated with greater volume, the drum was beaten with increased force and the dancing began. This wild confusion was increased by the wailing and mourning of those who had gathered about, forming a circle. It was a bewildering spectacle of color, noise and confusion, and the quiet, lonely prairie seemed transformed to a veritable pandemonium. The attitude of prayer was frequently assumed, either while dancing or standing still, by looking directly at the sun and extending the hands in supplication.

ing coffee for the feast of beef, bread and melons. There have been missionaries among these Indians as early as 1873, when the Friends worked among them. Through their influence, the Indians built for themselves a little church, where they still worship. They choose one of their own number as pastor. At the present time he is John Wolf, a full blood, who is clerk in a trader's store. The preaching and whole management of the church is conducted by the Wichitas.

There are Indians who try to take a middle course in religion, and who, at the same time, want to be Christians and ghost-dancers. The young Indians believe implicitly what the older ones tell them, and when an Indian declares he has been to "the world beyond," and has seen departed friends, they are convinced. Their prophet, Wovoka, who caused the greatest revival of Indian religion that ever occurred, and who instituted the ghost-dance, says: "I went up to heaven, and saw God and all the people who had died a long time ago. God told me to come back and tell my people they must be good and love one another, and not fight or steal or lie. He gave me this dance to give my people."

Sympathy would seem to be merited by men and women who are being drawn onward by Christian, civilizing influences, and at the same time are held back by all the forces of venerable traditions peculiar to their people.

WHAT is the use of hiding the fact that there is more sleeping done in the churches than in most places. Many of our churches are great Sunday dormitories. Men who are troubled at home with insomnia, and cannot sleep on the pillow at night, find in churches sometimes the needed anodyne. What morphine and chloral and pillow of hops cannot do, sometimes the sermon and the long prayer accomplish. Said the old Puritan clergyman, "And now, to be brief, eighteenthly!" Oh, how many arts to appear awake in church! You have seen men put their heads down on the pew in front, pretending they are overcome with emotion, when they are really overcome with drowsiness. I tell you, if we do not keep our audiences awake it is the fault of us, the clergy, and not the fault of the people. An old Scotch minister, preaching, saw one of his hearers sound asleep, and he said: "Donald, wake up; if you can't keep awake in any other way, take a pinch of snuff." "Ah!" said Donald, "Doctor, put the pinch of snuff in the sermon!" With all the artillery of eternity at hand, if a man cannot keep his audience awake, it is because he has missed his calling. What would you think of a man at a banquet taking out his watch every few moments to see how soon he could stop eating a cream meringue? The Gospel is a banquet, and our populations are starving for it, and their souls must have something to eat, and they have no patience with an entertainment which is all made up of napkin-ring, finger-bowl, and red tape. I put the complaint that the people do not like to come to church where it belongs. I say to the young men who are entering the ministry, if you want an audience do as Paul did when it was said of his preaching, "There arose no small stir about that way." Men want help—give them help, and they will come again. What do they care about the conventionalities of religion? How much of your Latin do they understand? What do they know about those long words that crawl through your sermons like thousand-legged worms? What do they care about your Arian controversy, when the controversy with them is how they can pay a note of $500 with $200, and how they can get comfort for the child they buried yesterday in Greenwood?

As long as we stick to the mere technicalities of religion in our churches, a few people may come, because it has been eternally decreed that they should come; but the great masses of the people will not come any more than they would come and sit down in an ice-house, or accept an invitation to spend an evening in the vault of a cemetery. The great battle in this country is to be fought, not between Christianity and infidelity, but it is to be fought between honest Christian enthusiasm and putrid stagnation. Let the churches of God wake up, hoist their banners, blow the trumpet, give the battle-shout, and in twenty years the earth will be the Lord's. It is high time we brought up the cavalry. The big guns are stuck in the mud.

Sour Christians

THERE is a class of persons in the community whose usefulness we have found out. We never realized until now what they were made for. They are struck through with acidity. Their disposition is celebrated for its crabbedness. You find them in every circle. They are especially known in churches as fault-finders. Their teeth are always on edge. They are critical of minister, eldership and choir. Whatever is done, they act as though they could have done it better. You sometimes feel like suggesting to them the propriety of going to some other church, or retiring into less conspicuous position. You look upon them as a nuisance and hindrance. Stop! You are wrong. They have their practical uses. Church life, if happily conducted, is a banquet at which the sweet predominates. There is the sugar of helpful words and the saccharine of genial association. The banquet is in danger of becoming flat and insipid. There ought to be at least one vinegar cruet in the castor. You need to give variety to the feast. You do not more need spices than pickles. Now you know the use to which some people can be put. Do not cast them out. Do not let them be the means of exasperation. Employ them at the church banquet. Tarts are good in their place. Brethren, pass around the pickles.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S MEDAL FOR HEROISM

AS announced in previous issues, the proprietor of this journal purposes to award, once a week, a medal for the most meritorious case of personal bravery occurring during each week in the year. The first medal awarded will be for the most deserving act of heroism taking place in the first week of January, 1901. Every reader is invited to forward to us earliest information of any deed of true heroism, occurring in his own locality. Send accounts only of thoroughly authentic cases, and tell the story from personal knowledge, not from hearsay. A committee in New York will meet once a week and, on investigating the facts presented, will decide which case is most deserving of recognition. This award is not for heroism in the line of paid professional duty, but for that which is absolutely voluntary and spontaneous, and without emolument. The medal is of bronze, of elegant design. On one side is the inscription: "For Christ and Humanity. CHRISTIAN HERALD, N. Y.," and on the other side, "This medal was struck in commemoration of the heroism of in saving life on 1901."

Give the exact date, as only cases happening on or after January 1, 1901, will be considered. To give the committee time to satisfy all inquiries, to investigate all claims, and to allow time for stamping the medal, some weeks must elapse after the event before the medal can be awarded. In addition to this award, honorable public mention will also be made, weekly, of others who have distinguished themselves in an heroic way in the same period, and whose names, together with the story of their heroism, have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Address all letters on this subject to Chairman, Medal Committee, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

A STEPPING-STONE TO HAPPINESS . . .

HEALTH is the good fortune of the Soul. Health is the salt of life. Health is that state in which mere living is felt to be enjoyment; in which all simple and natural pleasures are appreciated, and our little everyday anxieties of business sit lightly on us. All men and women will agree to this; and yet few try to attain this blessed state as if they did believe in it. We all pray for health as the best of God's earthly gifts, and then, if the matter is left in our hands, there are a score of objects we prefer to pursue. It is startling to think how many people we all know who habitually sacrifice health for some object they confess to be less worth having.

Now, as good health is undoubtedly one of the most positive sources of human happiness and human availability, attention to it is a moral duty; and to be reckless of it is equally unrighteous as to be careless of our intellect, or our money, or any other thing which is conducive to the best use of life. For bad and good health have a strong influence on character, and nervous and physical fatigue do breed in many cases a decided moral indifference, just as moral indifference breeds nervous and physical fatigue.

For the last two thousand years no generation has made such a noise about the acquirement of good health as our own. It would seem as if some of our colleges had no other object than the attainment of bodily perfection, and the one prevalent idea of the average man and woman turns around and around their wheels on the subject of "taking exercise." But exercise is not the only condition—nor is it in all respects the most important condition—of health. The way in which people eat and drink has, perhaps more than anything else, to do with the freedom and elasticity of their faculties.

For instance, men of business dine at one hour to-day and at a very different hour to-morrow, and they never imagine that this is one of the sins against the body for which they will be brought to account. They go home from a hard day's work, and immediately on arriving there eat a hearty meal. They are careless as to the quality of their food; they eat anything set before them.

Women err equally in eccentricity as to their times of eating. They go shopping, and let their regular meals slip, drink tea and eat ices and sweetmeats. They come home weary and fretful, and drink more tea to stimulate or soothe; and not only their bodies, but their intellect and their temper suffers. And yet, no moral duty we perform brings so sure and so speedy a reward as that of observing what we eat and the proper time to eat. Thus, if we know that eating a certain dish, or eating at a certain time, will make us feel heavy and unfit for doing our best work, and so have the moral courage to abstain, we get our quid pro quo immediately, in the most prompt and undeniable shape.

Excessive brain work is the American besetting bodily sin. Exercise and regular diet up to a certain point may repair the mischief, but even these adjuncts do not supply the brain fuel as rapidly and as certainly as the consumption demands. No man or woman can do mental work eight or ten hours daily all the year round without impairing health, yet thousands are constantly attempting the impossible feat. Vacations and holidays are certainly more frequent than they used to be, but what is needed is a vacation so long that it allows the system time for entire recovery. A number of short changes cannot compensate for this absolute necessity. But the desire to be rich, to be famous, to get to the top of their profession, the love of a sedentary life, all these things make men as careless about their bodily health as if they believed the old theology, that it was wicked to concern themselves about the body.

Fortunately the enlightenment concerning bodily exercise has touched women also. I can remember when the idea of a woman in a gymnasium or a boat was one at which fools grinned. Yet three-fourths of the weariness and lethargy that were so commonly complained of in women, and of which women themselves were bitterly sensible, was due to their want of exercise—the circumstances of their sex and the prejudices of society being nearly insurmountable. Twenty-five years ago, a famous writer said that "women got their rights, they would er gymnasiums for themselves." It is a matter of rejoicing that they have erected gymnasiums without waiting for their rights.

The ideal and the spiritual in humanity, in spite of all our Athletic Gospel—will not be subjected to blood and muscle; or else the finer race will be worn away by the strong, and the "fittest" will not survive. Is this be so? No! The experience of the present generation denies it. The fleet-footed Indian, with his perfect muscular system, driven before the far less sinewy white man, and the animal vitality of the negro race do not enable it to subject the intellectual white race, even when the latter has climatic and other serious difficulties to also contend with. Physical strength, unless crowned with gentleness, thoughtfulness for others, patience with the weak and suffering, is a much lower type of excellence than at first sight appears. It is a kind of excellence in which the savage and primitive man will always excel. But the earth is not given to this type. The greater race of humanity will not be to the swift foot, and the strong of arm, but to the far reaching intellect, and to the heart filled with the love of God and the love of man. The fore, the weak need not despair, and the strong need not boast, for each there is work to do for each an example to set. The weak must show forth strength, and the strong show forth gentleness, for

Sad it is to be weak,
Sadder to be wrong,
But if the Strong God's statutes break,
'Tis saddest to be strong.

Oriental Womanhood

THE Algerian woman of the upper classes has been not inaptly compared to the bird in the gilded cage. In the harems of wealthy Mohammedans, in city or suburbs, wives and daughters lead lives of luxurious but sad seclusion. In miserable hovels, women of the poorest class eat, sleep, and eke out a wretched existence when not seeking alms under some pretext, or peddling bread, leeks, onions, needlework, curio or other articles on the streets. Between these two extremes are the women of the middle classes, who share more or less the caged life of the rich noble's or merchant's wives and daughters, and more or less in the freedom of the women who labor and beg. The Jewish or Christian woman alone goes free and unveiled, irrespective of position. The Kabyle woman is free, also, but she is rarely seen in the cities.

Three successive days are considered Sabbaths in Algiers—the Christian's Sunday; Friday, the Mohammedan Sabbath; and Saturday, the Sabbath of the Jew. On Saturday the Jewish women appear gorgeously clad in black velvet gown, jackets bright with trimmings of gold and silver, and kerchiefs of brilliant hue. The Moor and the Arab lady is always veiled. Her enveloping "haik," of the wool, silk, or cotton, may be eighteen yards long; it is usually of gleaming white. Her anklets tinkle as she walks; her sandals are embroidered; her armlets, her wrists, her neck, her ears are loaded with jewels.

At the public bath, the cemetery, and the mosque, women meet each other socially. At the first they gather and refresh themselves during certain hours on certain days; they gossip; they talk about their sons and daughters, and they make matches for young people who have never seen each other. To the cemetery of Abd-el-Rhaman they make pilgrimage on Fridays, and it is said gossip and match-making go on amid the gleaming white gravestones where the white-veiled figures move like ghosts. At the sacred fountain in the court of Abd-el-Rhaman shown in the picture on the first page perhaps such interchanges are not unknown.

From time immemorial, the bath and fountain have constituted their places of rendezvous for Oriental women—their women's club and mothers' meeting, so to speak. At the Fountain of the Virgin the women of Jerusalem gather and converse to-day with as much zest as do the women of Algiers, around their own sacred fountain.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

To Telephone Under the Sea

ANOTHER vast stride in electrical progress appears to have been made through the experiments of Prof. M. I. Pupin, of Columbia University. This is nothing less than a telephone cable by which there can be verbal communication across the Atlantic. That it is a genuine discovery is apparently proved by the fact that after testing it for six months, the Bell Company is reported to have agreed to pay half a million dollars for the right to use it, besides an annual royalty of $15,000 for a term of years. Prof. Pupin in describing his discovery, said that it could not be fully explained without technicalities which would not be easily understood, but the essential principle was simple. The chief difficulty had been to overcome resistance. In the present ocean cables the current has so many obstacles to battle with that it is comparatively slow in traveling and becomes very weak before it reaches its destination, three thousand miles away. Prof. Pupin, after long experiments, finally discovered that the insertion of eight induction coils to every mile of wire would overcome this resistance, and could be sent over the cable at a much faster rate. By this means every time the current begins to slacken its strength it will meet one of the coils, which will give it renewed impetus till it reaches the next coil, and so on. It is practically a relay method of supplying strength. The new system will require new cables, which will involve an enormous outlay. It is this feature only that is retarding the work at present. The cables will require no greater strength in electricity and no different transmitters from those used now. The same principle, when applied to land wires, will enable people to converse at great distances more easily than at present, and will make conversation between New York and San Francisco practicable. The system appears reasonable, when it is once known that the current gains new power from a coil. As the Professor says, it is a relay method of supplying strength. It is a principle that applies to Christian life and work. Mighty as is the power imparted at conversion, it needs renewal by frequent communion with God.

They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength (Isa. 40: 31).

A Clue to a Treasure

A remarkable story of the discovery of buried treasure is told by the New Orleans Times-Democrat. It appears that an officer in an engineer corps recently purchased an old manor house in Northern Georgia, which had stood empty for many years. While examining the house with a view to repairs he noticed a brass nail protruding from an angle in the wall; and near it, roughly scratched on the stone, the figures, 140. The fact made little impression on him until he came upon another nail farther along in the same wall with the same figures. His curiosity was excited, and he dwelt a good deal on the matter. Finally he decided to explore. He took two lengths of cord, each measuring 140 feet, and attached one to each nail. Carrying these outwards and bringing them together, he had a triangle, of which the wall of his house was the base. The apex of the triangle was among some bushes in a shrubbery, and there he dug a hole. At a depth of three feet he found a tin box. It contained a number of deeds and securities now worthless, but underneath the papers, a quantity of watches, rings, and jewels of considerable value. Memoranda in the box showed that it had been buried nearly forty years. The owner had evidently died, carrying the secret of his buried treasure to the grave. He was probably a man of mathematical training. The clue he left to the hiding-place was a slight one, but it was sufficient for a man of similar training, though it might have been meaningless to others. It is so with the treasures that are to be found in God's Word; the worldly-minded do not perceive them, but the spiritual man makes them his own.

The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned (I. Cor. 2: 14).

Counterfeiters Arrested

A successful raid was made a few days ago on a factory in New York, which has been turning out counterfeit quarter dollars by wholesale. For a long time past the Sub-Treasury has been finding among the silver sent to it by the banks large numbers of counterfeit quarters. Lately, over fifty dollars a week of these coins have been sent in in New York alone. be-

She had sent an undertaker for the body, but the stepfather refused to surrender it, on the ground that money was owing to him for services rendered to the dead man in his last illness. The widow refused to pay the debt and claimed the body as her personal property, stating its value as one dollar. On her stating her case in court, a writ was issued authorizing her to take possession of the body. A policeman served it, and was allowed to remove it to the hearse which the widow had sent to receive it. The stepfather continued to press his claim, but the courts prohibited his holding the body as security. The law of Indiana, it appears, declares that a corpse is the property of relatives in the order of inheritance, and therefore clearly belonged to the widow. Under this law she has obtained possession of it, and has had it decently interred. Doubtless the widow placed a much higher estimate of value on the body of her husband than that mentioned in her plea, otherwise she would not have striven so hard to obtain possession of it. But it is significant that in a formal legal document the value of a body should be set so low. What must the soul be worth, if all that remains, when it is withdrawn, is worth before going to seek her out. Recently he was appointed President of the railroad and then he came East to see if the girl was still unmarried. He found her living quietly at home with her parents, and still expecting his return to fulfil the engagement made forty years ago. It was a rare example of constancy. Few girls would have held their faith in a man unshaken through all those years, believing that he would come back, as he had promised, to marry her. If such faith were more prevalent among Christians, there would be more watchfulness for the fulfilment of Christ's promise.

There shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts and saying Where is the promise of his coming? (II. Peter 3: 4).

BRIEF NOTES

The venerable Dr. J. G. Paton, in a thrilling account of his work in the New Hebrides, at a recent meeting, said that although his life had been attempted many times he had never received a blow or scratch.

Rev. Joel J. Janvier, a native preacher of Northern India, who died recently after forty-three years hard work, was at the beginning of that period the only Christian in that region, where there are now 78,000 Christians and 92,000 children in Sunday Schools.

The second annual conference to promote the federation of Churches and Christian Workers throughout the United States will be held in Philadelphia, February 5 and 6.

A prisoner at Southampton, England, probably holds the record for drunkenness. He has been convicted 153 times, and last year spent 336 out of the 365 days in prison.

Rev. Albert G. Lawson, of the North Baptist Church, Camden, N. J., announces that on Inauguration Day, March 4 next, his church will devote the hour from 12 to 1 noon, to prayer, for the President and nation. He suggests that similar services be held all over the land on that day.

Rev. Arthur Crane, evangelist and pastor of the First Baptist Church, Charleston, S. C., has been conducting a series of Gospel meetings in the Free Baptist Church, Marcy avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. Mrs. Emma Moffatt, of Los Angeles, Calif., assisting him as Gospel soloist.

Gen. Kelly-Kenny, one of the British commanders in South Africa, is quoted as saying that the war in the Transvaal had clearly proved that it was possible to endure great hardships and do the hardest kind of fighting while practising absolute total abstinence from intoxicating liquor.

The Pope has ordered about 150,000 old swords, halberds, pikes, battle-axes and other venerable weapons stored in the Vatican to be melted and sold for old iron, and a furnace for doing the work has already been erected in the palace grounds. This attempt to convert the sword into the plowshare is, it seems, not so much the verification of prophecy as a measure of economy. The cost of keeping them clean and free from rust has been large.

An inquiry at one of the department stores in New York, elicited the fact that of the enormous number of books sold during the holidays more than one-half were Bibles. Other stores also reported large sales. One store had sold over thirty thousand copies during the year.

The old-time Day of Prayer for Colleges occurs this year on January 31. As there happen to be five Thursdays in the month, some confusion arose as to whether the observance would take place on the fourth or the fifth Thursday. But while some institutions observed the earlier date, the majority will observe the later.

In ecclesiastical circles in Italy the proposition has been made that the Catholic world should unite in inaugurating the new century by placing a colossal statue of Our Lord on that highest crest of the Sabine Mountains near Rome, known as "the Mentorella." The proposed site is about 4,000 feet above the sea level, and can be clearly seen from Rome and from the Mediterranean.

Statistics gathered by the Advance show that of 70,000 young men in American colleges 38,000 are church members, and over 5,000 are candidates for the Christian ministry. During the past century the increase of church membership to that of general population is as twenty-seven to nine. There are in the United States over 100,000 Christian ministers, and over 145,000 church edifices.

Rev. Graham Lee writes: In our station in Corea this year we have baptized 781 people, and received 1,944 as catechumens. There are many more waiting and anxious to be baptized who would have been had it been possible for us to cover our field properly. These people gather in 179 outstations. We have now fourteen helpers, eight of whom are supported by the Coreans, and two more will be supported just as soon as the missionaries in charge have the men to recommend.

THE TELEPHONE CABLE ON ITS OCEAN BED

sides quantities from out-of-town banks. They are made of sterling silver and are fully equal in value to the genuine coins. This made it very difficult for any one except the Treasury experts to detect. Secret Service officers were detailed on the case, and they found that sheet silver was being purchased in large quantities by Italians in New York. Tracing these men, they discovered that a factory existed in an old house in the lower district of the city. They broke into it and found there a five-ton press with dies for making the coins and a quantity of silver disks ready for stamping. Seven men and one woman were at work and were arrested. They had been able to buy for $64 silver with which they could make coins worth $125, which were circulated without difficulty. This was due to the fact that the coins were made of good material. The mischief was done through its being put to base uses. It is so in the spiritual world. It is not the men who are openly bad that impose on others; but the men who prostitute their good qualities to evil courses.

The men that were at peace with thee have deceived thee and prevailed against thee (Obad. 7).

A Suit for a Corpse

A curious suit was tried recently in Indianapolis, Ind. It was brought by a woman under replevin proceedings to recover the dead body of her husband, who had died in the home of his stepfather.

only one dollar? Yet how few bestow on the soul a hundredth part of the attention they give to the body!

Therefore, I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on (Matt. 6: 25).

Waited Forty Years

A romantic wedding was solemnized in Boston, Mass., on January 7. Forty years ago, a lad who was studying law at Dexter, Me., fell in love with the daughter of one of the leading lawyers of the Maine bar. He had no money and no influence, so that his prospects of maintaining a wife were very dubious. The girl, however, had abundant faith in his ultimate success and she promised to wait for him to make his way. He went West as soon as he was called to the bar, and settled at Stillwater, Minn., but there was no chance there for a young and unknown lawyer, so he tried other towns with like results. Finally he became discouraged, and giving up the law became a teacher, but having no training for the profession, he made no progress. Then he tried farming, and that, too, yielded no profit to the unskilled worker. Then he entered the service of a railroad company and at last found that he was in his proper sphere. His previous failures had so discouraged him that he had failed to keep up his correspondence with the girl of his choice, so he waited until his success was assured

TEMPERANCE LESSONS ON THE TALENTS

How Talents are Buried To-day

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON
for Feb. 10: Matt. 25: 14-30

GOLDEN TEXT. Rom. 14: 12: "So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God."

By...
Dr. and Mrs.
Wilbur F. Crafts

IET us get at the heart of this lesson at once, namely, that the boys and girls just starting out in life are the persons to whom Jesus has given the "talents" which shall be increased or buried as they shall choose. And because so many bury their talents in the ocean of drink—sadder than any burial at sea—the International Lesson Committee have selected this parable as one of the four temperance lessons of the year.

The Kingdom of Heaven. Every one who ponders this parable and its companion in last Sunday's lesson must see that the "kingdom of heaven" is not heaven above, but "heaven begun below," in fulfillment of the prayer which Jesus could not have taught in vain, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done as in heaven so on earth." The parable of the ten virgins represents the inward spiritual repose, the parable of the talents, the outward practical activities of the citizens of this kingdom while waiting and watching for the final triumphant appearing of their Lord. Some of us need more repose of spirit, others more Christian activity. The Philadelphia Ledger, discussing these two classes of people in one of its thoughtful Saturday editorials, says: "If those who are naturally energetic will foster the power of repose, and those who are naturally tranquil will cultivate the power of action, the health and happiness of both will be greatly increased, and their value to the community will be redoubled."

This lesson suggests many great truths:

1. All we have comes from God and belongs to God.
2. It is our duty to grow, making the most of our capacities and opportunities.
3. Christ will come to judge our work.
4. Christ's judgments fall not alone upon those who do wrong, but especially upon those who fail to do good.

A man traveling into a far country, who called his own servants and delivered unto them his goods.

Nothing We Have is "Our Very Own" but Sin

Jesus, who was then about to leave the earth to return to heaven, is the Master who calls "his own servants"—that is what we all are by right, whether we acknowledge it or not. "Ye are not your own," he said to us all. Proud men call themselves "self-made men" and "worship their creator." They boast, "I am my own master." But the Bible points us to God and says, "It is he that hath made us and we are his." "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." All we have also he gave us. They are "his goods," loaned to us for life in trust to do good with in his name. "We brought nothing into the world and it is certain we can carry nothing out." Therefore we should be thankful rather than proud if there be anything excellent in what we are or have.

How early the selfish sense of private ownership develops! The child of three years old wants things for "its very own." He is not willing to own things in common with brothers and sisters. Even so young should a child be taught that everything belongs to God, and that he lets us use his "goods" to do good with.

Unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one. "Talents" in Bible times meant money, just as "goods" then and now mean property. But "talents" now means what is more precious than money—skill of hand and mind. In our selfishness we name as "goods" only what has money value. But other gifts of God are yet more truly "goods." He is the Giver of every good and perfect gift, and all his gifts are such. Even when he gives affliction he is giving us "his goods."

Talents that God Gives to Boys and Girls

The "talents" and "goods" that God gives to boys and girls to start them in life include, first, a wonderful body. Unless deformed, you have "five talents" in the fingers of each hand, which you can make more and more skilful and useful by training; skilful in music, in mechanics, in gesture. Even your handshake may be a power for good if the unselfish heart of Christ throbs in it. Learn to swim, not for amusement and health only, but because it may become a talent with which you can do good to others. Again and again last summer the papers told of young girls who had become expert swimmers, one as young as eleven, who rescued drowning men at seaside resorts. Make yourself strong, not to foster pride, but that you may do better work now and in trying days to come. Washington's gymnastic training and clean habits laid up strength to bear the strain of Valley Forge. Lincoln strengthened his body when a young man by long walks, by wrestling and lifting. "He could lift over half a ton," says Wm. O. Stoddard, who was one of his secretaries. That and proper habits prepared him to endure the labor of studying law at night after splitting rails all day, and for the awful strain of leading his country through a great war. If either of these men had buried their talent of bodily strength in dissipation instead of increasing it by exercise, the whole history wants you to do for life, but you can generally see just what he wants you to do next. If you daily follow the old motto, "Do the next thing," you will at last have done God's will for life.

Never a day is given,
But it tones the after years,
And it carries up to heaven
Its sunshine or its tears;
While the to-morrows stand and wait,
The silent mutes by the outer gate.
There is no end to the sky,
And the stars are everywhere,
And time is eternity,
And the here is over there;
For the common deeds of the common day
Are ringing bells in the far-away.

—HENRY BURTON.

Well done, thou good and faithful servant. Note that the same rewards, "praise, promotion, joy," are given to him who faithfully used and so doubled his two talents, as to him who doubled his five. It is not so much success as faithfulness that God honors. His command is, "Be thou faithful," which may often mean the very opposite of the American motto, "Get there." To be shown himself faithful in the least he won like those of this parable, praise, promotion and the joy of ever-widening usefulness. "What is that in thine hand?" Only a pen. You cannot speak for temperance like Gough or Bain or Wooley. You cannot write books or even newspaper articles. But you can write a letter or telegram, the like of which sent by all the one talent men would carry temperance laws in Congress and State legislatures. "What is that in thine hand?" Only a vote. But one vote has decided in more than a score of "no license" elections in Massachusetts whether the boys should for a year be protected against the saloons. You are the man who buried his talent and was condemned by Christ if you have neglected to vote.

Nothing buries so many talents as drink and the vices that commonly precede and follow it. Gen. O. O. Howard tells us that battles were lost in our Civil War with all the blood and broken hearts, because generals, in some cases, and private soldiers, in others, were drunk. Thomas Jefferson had seen so much harm done to our country's interests in its civil service by fuddled brains that he said if he were to be President again he would make total abstinence a condition of government employment. A recent report of the United States Bureau of Labor (which any American citizen can get by applying to that Bureau in Washington, D. C.) shows that more than half the employers in the United States in some or all branches of their work, either insist upon total abstinence altogether or while men are on duty, or at least favor abstainers, other things being equal, in selecting employees. Boys who desire even earthly success should take note that liquor on the breath is nowhere a recommendation, and in many places insures rejection. Gen. Miles recently reaffirmed what he said as a young man twenty-five years ago: "One of the principal evils undermining the character of the youth of the country and destroying the intelligence of men, not only in the army but in nearly every business and profession, is the use of tobacco and alcohol. . . . I am fully convinced the world would be better without either."

Note that General Miles puts together "tobacco and alcohol." Tobacco, is not like alcohol, in "making a man crazy on purpose." It is extravagant to say one is as bad as the other. But both are alike: (1) Harmful to body and mind; (2) wasteful of money and strength; (3) incentives to evil passions; (4) enslaving. Think of a vegetable as the master of a man! And for Sunday School boys tobacco is the greater peril, just because it is rated as a lesser evil.

The Weather Bureau gave its best storm signal, when it published to the country that it would have no employees who clouded their faculties with cigarettes. Railroad after railroad has adopted the same plan. They will not take men who are burning up the brains they should use in their work.

Burying our talents by any vice or by idle neglect leads to "darkness" here and hereafter, in the disapproval of Christ and of conscience.

Children are all one-talent folks when they are little, whatever they may be when they grow up, but how much good they can do if they will live the sweet motto, "Little things are little things, but to do little things faithfully is a great thing." A whole book could be written on the great things that have come out of little things. Doing little things rightly when a child is the best preparation for doing great things nobly when we have grown up.

Let every boy and girl then multiply their talents of body and mind and soul by bringing them to Christ with this beautiful hymn of consecration, written for them by Marianne Farnham:

Just as I am, young, strong and free,
To be the best that I can be,
For truth and righteousness and thee
Lord of my life, I come.
I would live ever in the light,
I would work ever for the right,
I would serve thee with all my might,
Therefore to thee I come.

SERVANTS GIVING ACCOUNT OF THEIR STEWARDSHIP—BORDER OF ANCIENT COINS

of our country and the world might have been changed for the worse. It is as much our Christian duty to improve our bodies as our souls. "Glorify God in your body" is one of the New Testament commandments, corresponding to the Old Testament law, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy strength." There was a partial truth in the answer made by an American boy when asked the catechism question, "Who made you?" He answered in his own words, "God made me so long (measuring a baby's length) and I grew the rest." Physically, and mentally and spiritually we can at least help our own growth or God would not command us to "grow." The same idea is in the requirement of the parable we are studying, to increase our capital, our talents, by right use, whether many or few.

Every boy and girl, and especially every father and mother, should recognize that God has not made us all alike. "Some must follow and some must lead." He has made only a few five-talent people, for he has only a few five-talent places to fill. Nothing is sadder than to see an ambitious one-talent man rattling around in a five-talent place he cannot fill. Even those of equal talent are not alike. The rank of a statesman may be equal to, or greater than that of a poet, but to put either in the other's place might be a misfit.

Two questions should be studied by and for every child: Who made you?

What for?

It may not be possible to tell just what God faithful, many a martyr, many a hero has dared to fail. But God puts in his list of victors in Hebrews 11, such men of faith who were "slain with the sword." Here is a watchword for inspiration to daily faithfulness: "I shall pass through this world but once! Any good thing, therefore, that I can do or any kindness that I can show to any human being, let me do it, now, in his name, and for his sake! Let me not defer or neglect it."

I was afraid and went and hid thy talent in the earth—"Buried alive!" that has ever been counted the supreme crime of the periods of persecution. The man who buried his talent buried himself. Say rather he was of that numerous class who are dead, but not buried. Idle, hopeless, useless, they only exist when they might gloriously live, doubling their one talent by diligent and earnest use of it, till they outstripped many of the five talent men by greater activity. "A nimble nickel is better than a slow dollar." Many of the most successful people have little genius or talent except the talent for hard work. "What is that in thine hand?" God asked Moses. It was only a shepherd's hickory stick, but he made it, with God's help, mightier than Pharaoh's golden sceptre. A broom in the hands of Booker Washington, when he entered Hampton Institute, used with faithfulness in sweeping a school room, opened his way to the leadership of his race. Having

To Bury One's Talent a Wrong to God and Man

THE BOWERY MISSION'S

20th ANNIVERSARY

THAT the old Bowery Mission holds a place very near to the hearts of Christ's followers in New York, was made more than ever apparent by the vast audience which assembled in the Academy of Music, on the afternoon of Sunday, Jan. 13, to celebrate the Mission's twentieth anniversary. It was a day long to be remembered. At a time when the God-fearing element in the metropolis is actively engaged in a movement for the moral purification of the city, the presence of an audience at once so brilliant and representative was a striking manifestation of the popular confidence in the grand within our doors, and come under our influence. This is the kind of support the Mission has received during the past twenty years, and there is not, thank God, any sign of its withdrawal or weakening. But a new field—a new continent and a new world of Christian effort—lies before us. The whole community is aroused at the present moment on behalf of moral purification, and just now, when the forces that make for righteousness are gathering themselves together to make one supreme effort to lift the city into a higher and purer moral atmosphere, the Bowery Mission is just where it ought to be—on the front firing-line. Every dollar, therefore, given to-day will go in the most direct and tangible way towards the making and maintaining of a clean and pure city.

Old Mission, and of the universal sympathy with its soul-winning work, which has not influenced the Bowery alone, but the whole city, and thousands of homes throughout the nation. Long before the opening hour, the doors of the Academy were besieged by a multitude of men and women, clamoring for admittance; by 3.30 P.M. the great

The audience responded liberally to Mr. Hallimond's appeal and gave a generous offering. Another hymn was sung, after which the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage preached a most effective sermon from the text John 10:16. The great audience listened intently as the preacher eloquently pictured the tidal wave of moral reformation which was now sweeping over our cities. He declared that the crusade would result in the redemption of New York, which would be taken for God. The century opened with the brightest prospects. It would assuredly witness a great revival of religion. Many cities were to be redeemed. Official authority can do much, but nothing can take the place of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The most popular book on earth to-day is the Bible; the most popular name is Jesus. Thousands would die for him, where one would die for another man. "Put your face to the sunrise," he said. "Christ is coming to save New York."

The sermon created a profound impression. At its close, the Bowery Mission Male Quartette sang, and this was followed by the testimonies of redeemed men, converted in the Mission. These were listened to with intense interest. These men were only types of many who had been brought to Christ in the old Bowery Mission.

The testimonies were followed by another beautiful solo by Rev. F. H. Jacobs, "The Wonderful Story," then the well-known Gospel hymn, "Saved by Grace," in the chorus of which the whole audience joined heartily. Dr. Talmage then pronounced the benediction, and the great audience slowly dispersed.

We commend to our readers the work of the Bowery Mission, and invite their active support and prayerful cooperation. Every contribution for the Mission's work sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be duly acknowledged in its columns. At this time, when a great wave of moral reform is sweeping over the land, and when every human agency is enlisted in the work of uprooting the dives, the gambling-houses, and other dens of sin, it becomes the duty of all who love righteousness to take an active part in the warfare. In no better or more direct way can they contribute to this end than by giving a helping hand to the Bowery Mission.

It has stood all of these twenty years for consecrated work, and its converts are found all over the globe. Many a time it has been almost alone in the fight against vice in the "world's wickedest thoroughfare" and amid the hosts of sin in lower New York. Thousands, year by year, have found it a haven of peace, and the entrance to a better life. At the opening of a new century, there could be no more appropriate personal tribute to the Master's work than a gift which may be the means, under Divine blessing, of bringing some poor wayfarer, sick of sin, into the Mission fold, and up to its altar, where he may lay his burden of sin at the foot of the Cross, and enter upon the new and better life.

THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, WHERE THE ANNIVERSARY SERVICES WERE HELD

The anniversary services opened with the hymn, "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," led by Prof. Albert H. Jacobs, the soloist, as conductor, the whole audience joining in the singing. The vast gathering sang as with a single voice, and the great swell of harmony rose, many of those on the thronged sidewalks caught up and prolonged the notes of praise. Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman offered the opening prayer, and earnestly pleaded for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all present. Mr. Jacobs sang with touching pathos the sacred solo, "Will There be Any Stars," after which Mr. J. G. Hallimond, Superintendent of the Mission, made a brief address. Reviewing the work of the Mission, he said, in substance:

Among the rescue missions of the world, the Bowery Mission occupies a thoroughly unique position. Many religious enterprises have been carried on upon a much more extensive scale, and have been of a much more pretentious character; but for a protracted and sustained soul-saving work, few institutions in the history of the Christian Church can furnish a record like that of the Bowery Mission. For twenty years it has stood in the darkest section of the city, holding out a helping hand to those who were about to disappear in the black depths of eternal despair. Wonderful as the results have been in the past, the opportunity is now presented for immensely enlarging and strengthening its activities. For twenty years the work has been carried on unostentatiously. It was inaugurated by humble but consecrated people; and all along it has been supported by Christian workers of limited means from all the denominations. For the last five years especially, during which time it has been under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the funds, with two notable exceptions (Dr. Klopsch and Mrs. Bird) have come from a multitude of small contributors all over the United States and Canada—from poor men, themselves redeemed in the Mission; from fathers in the far-away Antipodes, sending thank-offerings for the reclamation of their sons. Many a time a tear-stained letter arrives from a sorrowing mother, enclosing twenty-five or fifty cents, and asking us to pray for her wandering boy, who, she hopes, may some day turn

SUPERINTENDENT HALLIMOND PLEADS FOR THE OLD MISSION

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A PARENTAL MISTAKE

TWO ladies were conversing in my presence the other day, and their theme was very naturally their children. One of them, a devoted mother, and in her heart an appreciative mother as well, made statements about her son Joe, aged twelve, which was startling. "Joe is as slow as an old coach, it agitates the household to get him dressed in the morning and started for school. Joe has no idea of the value of money; if he sees a thing he must have it, no matter what it costs. Joe is a most inveterate tease. Joe is as vain as a peacock." Thus she ran over the catalogue of Joe's imperfections, while her listener, a very literal and matter-of-fact person, laid the exaggerated complaints away in her memory for future use. The facts about Joe were that he was an ordinary, bright-witted, irresponsible little fellow, growing so fast that he was rather sluggish in his motions, but on the whole a charming child. The droll thing was that his mother thought so, too, and was amazed when I said to her, "Two years from now, you may be sending Joe to Mr. —'s office to secure a business position; and you are dropping into the mind of Mr. —'s wife, some convictions about your son which will perhaps affect him adversely in days to come. The —'s take everything at the foot of the letter, and you have impressed it on Mrs. — that your boy is vain, heedless, slow, and a torment." The mother opened her eyes widely. "My!" she exclaimed. "How stupid she must be if she thinks I meant that. Joe is a clever, obedient, conscientious boy, the pride of my life, and has no more faults than any healthy lad of his age ought to have." "So I imagined," I replied; "but I want Joe's mother to turn over a new leaf in her conversation about him; for a thousand and one reasons, no parent should ever malign a child. In all our comments on our homes we should put the best foot forward. It is to the last degree a mistake to do anything else."

Not long since I was telling a friend about a youth in our neighborhood, a manly, fine fellow, who was taking a noble stand in the community, and showing himself a true Christian. "His mother says," the friend replied, "that Sammy is no better since he joined the church than he was before." I do not know what the mother expected, for Sammy had been an exemplary child, and there were no airs of saintship for him to assume, but I fancy that she simply desired to be contradicted, and that her remarks were made for that purpose. If mothers wish to correct the defects of their children and young people, by all means let them do so, but let it be done, as reproof should always be done, entirely in private, while to the public and to friends and acquaintances only kind words and comments should be made about one's household, from the greatest to the least.

About Old People

We are all on the road which leads to old age, and if we live long enough we shall one day arrive at gray hairs and feebleness. The former badge of venerable years comes to some women in their youth, and is vastly becoming, but infirmities, such as decrepitude, loss of sight, loss of memory, loss of hearing, loss of one's grip on affairs, creep on with advancing life, until the grasshopper is a burden. Would it not be a good plan to lay up stores of pleasant memories as the bee makes honey, that the old days may be glad days? And, while we are about it, are we as careful and thoughtful as we might be to be attentive to the old? They prize little acts of courtesy, and are grateful, and even when they seem crusty and crabbed, their hearts are touched by the loving kindness shown them by their friends. Their little ways should be respected, and their comfort sought, nor should the newer fashions be thrust upon them against their will. Let old people alone to a certain extent. They prefer it.

Housekeepers and the Sabbath

City housekeepers can do much toward preserving the rest of the Sabbath by a little care beforehand. The delivery of meats and groceries, of ice cream and similar provisions on Sunday morning is not necessary, and may be wholly done away with, if the housekeeper will but take adequate measures on Saturday to buy and keep what she requires. A whole host of people who lose Sunday morning in doing secular work may be relieved, and the excuse to take the Lord's day for business purposes be eliminated, if their customers and patrons will but exercise a conscience in the matter. The grocer's clerk, weary with Sunday morning's toil and too late for church, spends the rest of the day either in sleep or in some outing which he does not really need. To in a family there is one excessively unselfish person, always ready to give up, always ready to make sacrifices, to stay at home that others may go out, to wear the old frock that her sister may have a new one, to forego her rights and privileges without a protest, that person may just go on. She will not be particularly appreciated, and her sacrifices will all be taken for granted. Her relations will accept whatever she does, and will not attempt to persuade her to do otherwise. She may not be aware of it, but her very unselfishness will end in making those around her more than ever selfish, and more than ever ungrateful.

There are some of my readers who will say this has a pessimistic sound, but you have only to look about you to see that it is perfectly true. For in this world there is one thing which is better than unselfishness, and that thing is justice. Home life and human relations must be

A Child's Party

The lady lives in a beautiful house and has a retinue of people to wait on her great many pets and one lovely child, her only son. Not long ago she gave her little laddie a birthday feast, and to were asked every child in the village: the children of the laborers on the railroad and of the washerwoman at the Cent just as impartially as those of the rich neighbors. And all the children play together in the democratic freedom of their years, and they had a beautiful time and not one of them misbehaved. When they went home, the little host gave every child a present, for coming to help him keep his birthday fete.

Sailing-Sledges in China

It is well for the Chinese that they have amazing physical endurance and no nervousness, for their lives are of the hardest. Resenting as they do the intrusion of modern motor powers into their ancient realm, nothing is more certain than that the descendants of these very boatmen, whose difficult task our picture shows, will look back with incredulity at the primitive ways which now obtain. We ourselves, could we lift the curtain which hides remote ages, and see the primitive conditions of our own remote ancestors, might be more than astonished by contrast.

Early Candle-Light

In these wintry days the darkness comes early. If we can take the gloom for a spell of rest, then we may sit in the dark; but if we feel that we must go on with our work, do not let anyone be so foolish as to tax her eyes in the want of light. Transition lights are very trying. Light the candles, or the lamps, or the gas, or turn on the electricity, the very instant you are aware that you need illumination.

The Reverse of a Familiar Shield

We remember the old story of the shield with its two sides, one white, one black, about which the knights fought, each seeing only his own side. There is a parallel to this in every home, and the plain truth, to drop metaphor, is that the white shield of unselfish goodness is very apt to have a dark wrong side. For instance, if

This dear dog named Prince does all the churning every week for a farmer's family. He has the sagacity and patience of a human being and possesses much better manners than the average domestic assistant; is never cross, never impolite, and never reluctant to undertake his duty. I know another dear dog whose name is Gyp, and on a beautiful farm in the Catskills I have seen him, week after week,

QUEEN VICTORIA'S LAST HOURS

TWO continents were startled when the cable brought the news that the aged Queen Victoria was believed to be dying at Osborne House, Isle of Wight. An illness, which began only a few days before, suddenly developed alarming symptoms. Fainting spells were followed by great physical prostration and partial paralysis. The Queen's physicians, Sir Richard Douglas Powell and Sir James Reid, in their bulletins from the royal sick-chamber, held out little hope of the patient rallying. She lay in an inert condition, unable to move without assistance, almost sightless, and so weak that death was apparently only a matter of a few hours. The long and brilliant reign of great Britain's most popular sovereign was near its close.

As soon as her condition was fully realized, the royal family were summoned to the aged Queen's bedside. When the Prince of Wales arrived at Osborne House, Princess Beatrice took him to his mother. He was conscious, but very weak. The Princess of Wales, Princesses Louise and Christian, and other members of the family were soon beside the sufferer. The Dukes of York and Connaught were also in attendance. Emperor William, of Germany, was summoned to Osborne and traveled in all haste from Berlin. At the Queen's bedside there was no attempt at concealment of grief. The Prince of Wales and the other princes were overcome with emotion. The heir apparent to the throne showed signs of illness, and there are rumors that an attack of heart trouble has been precipitated by his grief and worry over the aged Queen's condition.

Many nobilities crowded the ante-rooms anxious for news of the patient, having hurried to Osborne House from all parts of England. The whole nation was stricken with grief over the condition of its beloved sovereign.

Every successive bulletin from the sick-room, when telegraphed to London, was the signal for a fresh outburst of sorrow as the bulletins afforded no substantial hope. Her condition was one of general collapse, so complete that all the bodily functions ceased, save as they were maintained by artificial means. Even ordinary respiration had to be kept up by the use of oxygen. Her heart trouble had been aggravated by the great weakness of old age, and by her extreme anxiety over recent public affairs. The physicians feared the formation of a blood clot on the brain, of which they found symptoms, even when other conditions had seemed to afford encouragement. On Sunday, in all the churches in Great Britain, prayers were offered for the royal sufferer. In our own country, too, there were few churches in cities in which the news of her seizure had been received, where the subject was not mentioned in prayer.

The Queen passed away without a struggle, "like one falling asleep," about 6:30 p.m., on January 22. All the royal family, including the German Emperor, were at her bedside when the end came. The Prince of Wales now assumes the throne as Emperor-King.

..MOTHERS OF FAMOUS SONS

Women Whose Influence has Helped to Mould Great Minds and Make Noble Careers Possible

BY MARY LOWE DICKINSON

A LOVELY picture, dear to all our hearts, is that of the mother keeping the cradle ajog with her foot, while her hands are busy with the tiny socks or the bigger socks, whose mending is sometimes the mother's only touch upon the household understanding. But the mother who would keep her hand upon the growing life must learn to deal with other points than those at the end of a needle, to weave stronger bonds than can be made of darning-cotton, and to sing the music to which the young new life keeps step, after the cradle is deserted and lullabies have ceased to charm.

LETITIA BONAPARTE
(Mother of Napoleon)

That mothers have been doing these greater things all down the centuries is proved by the record of the noblest men of every nationality. The list is so long that the few names which it is possible to choose should be considered suggestive of the riches of the field rather than as illustrative of the great, amply proven fact that the dominant factor in most great lives has been the influence of the mother.

Washington's Mother

Notwithstanding everybody's familiarity with her history and characteristics, the name of the mother of Washington has rightful precedence in our list. She was a beautiful girl, called the "Rose of Epping Forest." She married Augustine Washington, a widower and a gentleman of high standing and noble character, of large property and considerable personal attractions. She was brought to the large old-fashioned colonial house on the banks of the Potomac, where we can fancy the bride covertly exploring her new home and scanning the footprints of her predecessor. In this voyage of discovery she was arrested by a small, but rare treasury of books. The fly-leaf of one revealed the name of the owner, the first wife, "Jane Washington." Finding the inkhorn she wrote firmly beneath, "And Mary Washington," probably the first time she had written her new name. We all know how she read this book—it was Sir Matthew Hale's Contemplations—to her stepsons and her own sons; how it was revered by George Washington, and how it is treasured to-day at our national Mecca, Mount Vernon, where, both as mother and mistress, Mary Washington led and guided her boy into the manhood that made him his country's leader and guide. Here, also, as the Revolutionary War went on, and her neighbors thronged her with plaudits and praises of her noble son—their idol and hers—she restrained their extravagant words, saying simply, "George seems to have deserved well of his country, but we must not praise too much; George has not forgotten his duty."

When she heard of the surrender at Yorktown she raised her hands and fervently thanked heaven that all was over.

She had not seen her son for seven years. Now he was coming home. No word of "glory" or "honors" fell from his lips or hers. Yet this king among men had his reward. His mother had lived to welcome him back!

One has only to recall the familiar story of this noble mother's life to recognize its moulding power upon the patriot, the soldier and the statesman. His high temper and his habit of self-control were like her, as were his principles of equity and justice, his power of dealing with great and grave issues, and his habit of practical business detail. It was like her and like him, when she knew the world was regarding him as head of the nation, leader of victorious hosts, to say, "He has been a good son. I believe he has done his duty as a man."

The Mother of Lincoln

Abraham Lincoln's mother, says Mrs. Bolton, to whose sketches we wish to acknowledge our debt, possessed but one book in the world, the Bible; and from this she taught her children daily. Of quick mind and retentive memory, Abraham soon came to know it by heart, and to look upon his gentle teacher as the embodiment of all the good precepts in the book. Afterward, when he governed thirty million people, he said: "All that I am or hope to be, I owe to my angel mother. Blessings on her memory!" When he was ten years old, this saintly mother died of consumption, and was buried in a plain box under the trees near the cabin. For her boy the loss was irreplaceable. Day after day he sat on the grave and wept. A sad far-away look crept into his eyes, which those who saw him in the perils of his later life well remember.

Phillips Brooks' Mother

In the career of Phillips Brooks we have the tribute of a noble life to the influence of a noble mother. "The son Phillips," says the Rev. Julius H. Ward, in the New England Magazine, "seems to have inherited from his mother the deep and earnest piety and intellectual strength which have always been his characteristics." Mrs. Bolton says: "Mother-love was always a strong force in the heart of Phillips Brooks. It is related that when some one asked him if he was not afraid when he first preached before Queen Victoria, he replied, 'Oh, no; I have preached before my mother.'"

George Peabody's Mother

George Peabody was a poor little grocer-boy in a New England country store, who yet came to the place where he was able to leave nine millions to the needy and the homeless. When he went out into the world at eleven years of age to earn his living, he had already, through his beautiful devotion to his noble mother, earned the name of a mother-boy.

Of Bayard Taylor it is said that his mother, a refined and intelligent woman, who taught him to read at four, and who early discovered her child's love for books, shielded him as far as possible from picking up stones and weeding corn, and kept him from the hard work of farm life by claiming his help in rocking the baby, that thus she might be free for other household tasks.

William Lloyd Garrison's Mother

William Lloyd Garrison's mother, too, was a noble woman, deeply religious, willing to bear all and brave all for conscience sake. Very poor, there was no chance for William, either in school or college. When he was seven, his mother, having found work for herself as a nurse for the sick, placed the child with a deacon of the town. At sixteen he wrote an article for the Newburyport Herald, signing it "An Old Bachelor." It was his mother who, six hundred miles away, engaged at the sick bed of a patient, shared his delight and surprise when he saw it really in print. It was she who, through her long and loving letters, kept him in courage and gave him the inspiration to battle, that lasted long after the hand that penned them had ceased its work.

The Mother of Edison

The mother of the distinguished scientist, says a recent biography, was a woman of sweet and strong individuality, equipped with a solid, if unpretentious education, and endowed with rare abilities as a teacher. She was eminently qualified to deal with the plastic mind of her son, and it was to her judicious efforts, rather than to those of his father, that Edison owed that early impetus which gave such admirable scope and direction to his dawning powers. Under her guidance, at the age of twelve, a period when most boys are inflaming their imagination and perverting their moral sense with trashy and sensational fiction, Edison, partly from inclination, partly from over-consciousness, was wading through such ponderous tomes as Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Hume's History of England and History of the Reformation. We are justified in the inference that through such books as these, no boy, however remarkable, waded without the encouragement and companionship of the woman who could bestow not only the instructor's gift, but the mother's sympathy and love.

NANCY ELLIOT EDISON
(Mother of the Famous Electrician)

Henry Ward Beecher's Mother

Henry Ward Beecher says of his mother: "I have only such a remembrance of her as you have of the clouds of ten years ago, yet no devout Catholic ever saw so much in the Virgin Mary as I have seen in my mother, who has been a presence to me ever since I can remember. Do you know why so often I speak what must seem to some of you rhapsody of woman? It is because I had a mother, and if I were to live a thousand years I could not express what seems to me to be the least that I owe to her. From her I received my love of the beautiful, my poetic temperament; from her also I received simplicity and childlike faith in God." She studied literature and history while she spun flax, laying her books to the distaff. No wonder then that her great son was an omnivorous reader. She wrote and spoke the French language fluently, painted on ivory, sang and played on the guitar, and was an expert with her needle. So meagre was her salary for the increasing household, only $400 a year, that she started a select school in which she taught French, drawing, painting, and embroidery, beside the higher English branches. With all this work she found time to make herself the idol of her children.

Of Wendell Phillips, it is said that his love for his mother was a passion. "Her earliest gift to him," says Carlos Marty, was a Bible. Her one counsel for him was, "be good, do good." That Bible was his prized treasure for seventy years, and says Mrs. Bolton, "Years after, when he stood like a great oak in the forest, beat upon by wind and storm, he never forgot to keep his trust where his mother first taught him to place it. From her knowledge and common sense in political and mercantile affairs, he judged that other women must be able to take part in the world's work, and therefore through life he asked for them an equal place in home and state."

"A Model for Mothers"

It was Garibaldi who says of his mother, a woman of humble station: "She was a model for mothers. Her tender affection for me has, perhaps, been excessive; but I owe to her love, to her angel-like character, all the little good that belongs to mine? Often, amidst the most arduous scenes of my tumultuous life, when I have passed unharmed through the breakers of the ocean or the hailstorms of battle, she has seemed present with me. I have, in fancy, seen her on her knees before the Most High—my dear mother!—imploping for the life of her son, and I have believed in the efficacy of her prayers." "Give me the mothers of the nation to educate, and you may do what you like with the boys," was one of his favorite maxims.

In all the touching examples of the influence of motherhood, there is no story more tender than that of the devotion and the prayers that were rewarded finally by the conversion of St. Augustine. The heart-communion of son and mother was indeed "a fellowship of kindred minds."

The Mother of Napoleon

The mother of Napoleon Bonaparte was the mother also of twelve other children, eight of whom were living when she was left a widow, at the age of thirty-five. Napoleon said of her: "She managed everything, provided for everything, with a prudence which could neither have been expected from her sex nor from her age. She watched over us with a solicitude unexampled. Every low sentiment, every ungenerous affection, was discouraged and discarded. She suffered nothing but that which was grand and elevated to take root in our youthful understandings. She abhorred falsehood, and would not tolerate the slightest act of disobedience. None of our faults were overlooked. Losses, privations, fatigue, had no effect upon her. She endured all, braved all. She had the energy of a man, combined with the gentleness and delicacy of a woman." Such was Napoleon's love for her that he confessed to his friend, when in exile at St. Helena, that in all his vicissitudes, once only had he been tempted to suicide, from which he was saved by the loan of a sum of money from a friend, which sum he sent at once to relieve the distress of his mother.

It was Samuel Johnson's mother to whom he said in his last letter: "You have been the best mother, and, I believe, the best woman in the world. I thank you for your indulgence to me, and beg forgiveness of all that I have done ill, and of all that I have omitted to do well." It was to defray her funeral expenses that in the evenings of one week he wrote Rasselas, for which he received five hundred dollars.

Many needless sacrifices are made on the operating table of the surgeon. While the advances made in this branch of medicine have been most remarkable, and many lives have been saved by timely operations, people should not be too ready to undergo delicate and dangerous operations at the hands of the over-zealous surgeon when there is still hope of recovery by other means of treatment.

A case in point is that of Mrs. Ellen Erlenbeck, of Turin, N. Y. She was a sufferer for many years, had vainly tried many medicines and finally the physician advised an operation, but she protested and at last found the remedy that saved her life. Here is the story in her own words:

"I am a firm believer in the efficacy of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, for they restored my health after several doctors had told me that nothing but an operation would save my life. For nearly 30 years I suffered from female weakness which was aggravated by kidney trouble. I could stand but a few minutes at a time and at intervals would be confined to my bed for days.

"For about ten years I doctored continually and employed several physicians. I continued to grow worse and finally the doctors told me that my only hope was in an operation. I would not submit to this.

"Seeing Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People advertised in the papers I decided to try them. That was four years ago. I thought they helped me and I took, in all, six boxes of the pills. They are the best medicine I ever found. No one who sees me now would believe that I have suffered so much. I do not find it necessary to take the pills now and am able to do my own housework. I take pleasure in recommending Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to all who are in need of a good medicine.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Our Master's Church*

JAMES had carefully prepared his sermon and had it on his tongue's end, and if the people had not seemed to give him such a cold reception, he would doubtless have delivered it as he intended. Only one thought was in his mind. These people must know that their life's business is to take the world as they find it and try to make it better. Continuing the historical thought in a quiet, conversational tone, he conducted their minds gradually into the present. He told them the world needed their aid as Christians; that they would fail to impress it at once that it needed them, but a few discouragements should not withhold them from a good work.

He became most deeply in earnest, but still in a quiet tone, as though he were suppressing some power which was anxious to burst forth and have free course. When he narrated instance after instance of people who had endured, had suffered in obscurity, to make the world better, had, in fact, crucified themselves for the sake of others.

He talked to them as brother to brother, as he told them he had not come to be their leader that he might do it all. That the Master's church did not consist merely of the preachers or the officers, or some who had banded together for self-culture or education in the latest scientific investigation, or philosophical abstractions, or oratorical entertainment, or church theatricals; but living members of the Master's body, each of whom was to do his part.

He said, neither learning, nor social distinction, nor pride of prestige in the community, nor wealth, nor ritual, nor church membership, were the only requisites of the original church, and if they cherished these, they were far from the ideal. They must be unselfish and seek the world's reformation and conversion. Were they doing so with earnestness? Did they really believe in the Master? Would they then not get out of the groove of indifference? Would they not now make up their minds for a struggling future for the world's betterment and a Christlike condition? Would they not try to be such members of the Master's Church as the Master would have them?

All was tempered by his saying that other churches were in unfortunate conditions, and they must not become discouraged with the church because it was not the ideal. And there was only one way out of the present into a better, and toward the Christ condition, to hold to their church until, with much prayer and many struggles, they had placed it into a better working position. They must today consecrate their church to the ideal and themselves to constant, steady effort in the name of Christ and by his power, to conduct it gradually toward him.

They could not reform the community or the church in a few months, and if there seemed dark clouds overhanging, to unflinchingly keep on their way, and the sunshine would come by and bye. They must never give up until the victory had been won, or death had taken them from the work. It was the Master's Church, and the Master would not condemn it so long as there were so many willing souls, so many valiant workers for the sinful world in it.

The Homes of the Bible

BIBLE Homes and Families is the title of an interesting and instructive volume, prepared from the sacred story, by Jennie Anderson Pierson. It is copiously illustrated. In a brief preface, the author says: "The purpose of the book is to group Bible characters and scenes before its readers, and to open up to them the book of beginnings, the Key to the whole Bible. The home and the family, with all that emanates from them—marriage, life, death, sin, sacrifice, worship, nations and races, are here portrayed." Robert J. Burdette, the well-known writer and lecturer, has written an introduction to the work, in which he says:

"Small wonder that the home-love glows like a celestial fire in the human hearts when it dates back to Eden, when the stars frescoed the blue dome that canopied the bower which the first man and woman called home. Small wonder that the best-known song in the world should be a song of home, that first sang itself in the longing heart of a homeless man. So often it is, that out of the by-ways of sorrow, in the loneliness of troubled and grief-burdened lives, break forth the songs with souls, the stories that are eternal. So Milton sang the glories of light, when the glowing splendor of midday and the rayless mystery of midnight were alike to his sightless eyes. So, John Bunyan, looking from his den in the prison of old Bedford town, saw the busy city of Destruction, with its crowded marts and its careless men; he saw the flying Christian, crying 'Life—Life—Eternal Life!' He saw the dismal Slough and the distant shining wicket gate; he saw the hill of Difficulty and the House Beautiful, with its wonders of revelation; he saw the valley of Humiliation and watched the terrible battle with Apollyon; he saw the silent, darkly-flowing river, and caught glimpses of the gleams of glory that streamed from the opening gates beyond that Jordan. And all that his free soul saw, his chained hand penned on pages that can never fade. And so, too, when the world asked for a song of home, it waited through the ages, and the centuries, and the years, until there came to sing it for all home-loving hearts, a man without a home. The pathetic numbers that welled up like sobs of homesickness in the longing heart of Payne, closing his eyes upon the twilight of his pilgrimage among strangers, and in a foreign land, will awaken tender and sympathetic responses in the souls of men and women so long as they build homes for themselves. Only in the life of a homeless man, in the soul of a wanderer could such a love-song find birth and voice. He longed for home until his very life breathed itself into the passionate yearning. He dreamed, and his dreaming painted for him a picture of all that was fair, and pure, loving and beautiful, and this oasis in the wilderness of his life he called a home. And always, in every time and every land, when the singer sings of home, men will listen, with tender eyes and loving hearts."

HARD LINES

To Make a Man Toe the Mark.

To take both tobacco and coffee away from man seems pretty tough, but the doctor ordered me to quit both as my health was very poor and I had got where I could do but little work.

About a month after quitting I commenced on tobacco again because I could hardly stand it. I got along without the coffee for the reason that I had taken up Postum Food Coffee, which I found very relishing to the appetite, and wonderfully beneficial.

I have gained twenty-five pounds by its use and to-day I am a well man. I discovered in this way that it was the old-fashioned coffee that hurt me and not the tobacco. When I first tried Postum I did not relish it, but found that it was not made right, that is, they did not boil it long enough. Next time it came on the table, was fine and I have been using it ever since.

Mr. Fletcher, an old soldier of this place was troubled with dyspepsia. I told him of my experience and advised him to quit coffee and use Postum Food Coffee. This was some time ago. I saw him yesterday and he told me he had not felt better in twenty years, and nothing would induce him to go back from Postum to the use of common coffee. He had the same trouble in getting it made right to start with.

John Ashford of Dillon was also troubled with dyspepsia. I told him of my relief by the use of Postum Food Coffee, and warned him to be careful in having the Postum cooked long enough when he did try it. To-day he perfectly well and his appetite never better.

I could give you the names of a number of others who have been benefited by using Postum Food Coffee. I believe you are a true friend of suffering humanity.—Thomas Spring, Deavertown, Ohio.

HOW HE FOUND CHRIST

.. The Turning-Point in the Life of C. H. Yatman, the Evangelist ..

IN his youth, Mr. Yatman had a very unfortunate experience. He made three efforts to become a Christian and was overcome and defeated each time. If there is anything in this world that the church needs, or that Christian workers need, it is patience and forbearance, and long-suffering kindness, under as the very heart of God to bear with the erratic and sinful follies of youth, and never to give up because a man has sinned once, or twice, or even thrice. One of the noblest men I ever knew in my life told me that if the church had not been infinitely patient with him when he fell to sin three times during the first year which he tried to be a Christian, he would have been lost forever. But they were with him and buoyed him up and at last he stood; and when he told me about what he had stood for a third of a century, a very Gibraltar of righteousness in the city where he lived.

Well, Yatman had tried three times, and failed. The last time was the very worst of all, for the coolness of the church seemed to freeze him out, and for long when I came into this family, that I had to go entirely back on myself, and live condemned, or give my heart to Christ. For in all the round of their daily life, they were simply, quietly, but always Christians. I could not stand out against that."

I was not astonished when the third woman followed, a few months after she came into the family, in espousing the Christian life.

Matthias Plum was one of this sort. Yatman knew he was a Christian, and when, one morning in December, without a thought about conversion, or without the least idea of making any change in his moral or religious life, Mr. Plum approached him in a gentle, tactful way, and asked him the tremendous question: "Will you be a Christian?" all the latent forces of desire, all the hunger for peace and pardon, sprang into life, and, astonished at himself though he was, he found himself answering from the depths of his heart, "I will."

That settled it, and settled it forever, for though it had come suddenly like a shock, he meant business. He gave up not only his sins, but he gave his very self as a sacrifice unto God. It was one final make-over of his whole life and being to the Lord that in his hand he might find light and peace and heaven, and he found them all and more. Telling me about it the other day, Yatman said:

"I went at once, that same evening, to the church where meetings were being held, and made a poor, broken confession of my decision; and, blessed be God! in and by his Spirit's power, I have witnessed for him up and down the earth for one quarter of a century. I would like just fifty years of it to the full, and then go and see him face to face. Twice he has sent me on a missionary journey round the world, and now I am planning for a third. Paul had three, why should I not have as many?"

REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

ZACCHAEUS

A RECREANT Jew of long ago,
Grown hard and cold
Through love of gold,
Was publican in Jericho.

He robbed the rich with crafty skill.
None dared deny
His sordid eye,
But paid him tribute at his will.

And though he lived in luxury,
He knew the gibe
Of all his tribe,
The scorn of scribe and Pharisee.

But One, ignoring social ban—
A Nazarene
Of quiet mien—
Became the guest of publican.

Why marvel that the host was stirred?
His heart of stone
At once was gone—
All melted by the Master's word.

"The half my goods to worthy poor
Henceforth shall go;
And what I owe
Fourfold the debt will I restore."

A glory filled that rich man's home;
For God's own Son
Pronounced him one—
"To thee this day salvation's come!"

Christ the Way

A minister was going up the aisle of his church during a revival, when a young man earnestly cried to him: "Sir, can you tell me the way to Christ?" "No," was the answer, deliberately given; "I cannot tell you the way to Christ." "I beg your pardon," said the young man, "I thought you were a minister of the Gospel?" "So I am," was the reply. "How is it that you cannot tell me the way to Christ?" "My friend," said the minister, "there is no way to Christ! He is himself the way. All who believe in him are justified from all things. There is no way to Christ; Christ is here."

Atlas of the World And City Guide.

This is the most comprehensive and valuable book of its kind ever published. The maps are not cheap prints—they are printed just as finely as those in books 10 or 100 times its size—are all in four and five colors. The maps cover not only the world in a general way, but many of them are in detail, showing the most important points in the whole world which anyone might want to find. In addition to the maps and possibly not less valuable, is a fund of statistical and other facts of great value for daily if not hourly reference. It contains 64 pages 3x6 inches, handsomely bound in imitation leather, and is especially designed for pocket use.

Samantha at Saratoga.

This is Josiah Allen's wife's best book. Contains 272 pages and nearly 100 illustrations, many of the latter by Oppor of Puck. Is handsomely bound in stiff paper covers. Is without a doubt the funniest book of the century. Our edition has all the reading matter and illustrations contained in the $2.50 edition.

Comprehensive Webster Dictionary

Contains nearly every word in common usage, and fully answers the purpose of at least three out of every four people. A new device shows the plural forms of all the nouns. Another points out about 5000 especially difficult words; out the greatest of all achievements in modern dictionary making is the addition of 25,300 words to this dictionary by means of a single page, called the "Columbian Word-Builder." It has 12 departments, including a Gazetteer of the World, Letter Writer, Social Etiquette, Punctuation, Postal Guide, etc. It contains 192 pages 3x6 inches, bound in imitation leather covers, and is especially designed for pocket use.

in White Bronze Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere.

WHEN THE : : LORD COMES*

Readiness to Meet Christ at His Second Coming a Christian Duty

MODERN Christians have no such definite expectation of the Lord's Coming as the early Christians had. It is obvious from the Epistles that the Church lived in constant preparation for that event. These Thessalonians, for example, grieved over their dead all the more, because they feared that in quitting this life they would not participate in the glory of Christ's re-appearance. The effect of this hope on their lives was potent in every way. It led to consistency, for they dreaded sinful conduct lest the Lord might come and find them in transgression. It led to unworldliness, for why should they accumulate a fortune when at any moment the value of their possessions would be lost in the general triumph? It led to greater zeal, for they believed that the opportunity for service was short. But as one generation after another passed and Christ did not come, the great expectation began to lose its power. Even when the Epistle that we know as the second of Peter was written, there were indications of the approach of a time when scoffers would ask in mockery: "Where is the promise of his coming?" So, gradually, the Church began to reverse the error that had existed at Christ's first coming. As the Jews had expected a temporal king and were unprepared to recognize a spiritual king, the Church began to spiritualize the doctrine of the second advent, and cease to expect a king who would reign in person over the whole world.

Yet the promises of the second coming are so clear and definite, that only by a forced interpretation can they be made to appear to predict anything other than a glorious reign of Christ on the earth. Indeed, it is difficult to see how the prophecies can be fulfilled without such a consummation. Not even a general prevalence of Christianity over the world—not even the conversion of all the inhabitants of the earth would fulfil some of them. The personal element would be lacking if Christ were not here in person, and this personal element is the thing on which they lay the most stress. We are, therefore, forced to the conviction, in spite of the delay that seems so long to us, that he will come again, as he said, in the clouds with great glory; and this old, sin-stained, weary world will witness a period of happiness and blessedness inconceivable to us.

In what condition, then, will Christ find the world when he comes? That he was not sanguine we may infer from his own words: "When the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" Certainly if he came now, the conditions would not satisfy him. A large section of the world professes to hold him in highest reverence, and calls itself Christian. About one-third of the estimated inhabitants of the globe are nominally Christian; but of these how small a proportion make his principles the rule of their lives! There would still be only too valid ground for the reproach he uttered when he was here: "Ye call me Lord, Lord, but do not the things that I say." The governments that profess to be Christian still engage in war, and are still eager to possess ever more destructive weapons. Even in the Church, how few there are who seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, making worldly advantage a secondary consideration. How small, comparatively, is the effort to publish his Gospel among the heathen! How slight is the sympathy manifested among his people for the poor, in whom he took so keen an interest! What would be his indignation, if he came now, to find men calling themselves by his name in possession of wealth which they could never spend, while some of their brethren in him lack the commonest necessities of life? Certainly the Church in its corporate capacity would need a radical reform before it could meet him with joy and not with shame.

Nineteen hundred years has this Gospel of his been preached, and we rejoice in the progress that has been made, but how many are there to whom the news of his coming would bring unalloyed joy? If it were positively known that in one year Christ would come, what a change it would make in our lives! How much there is that we would like to do before we stand in his presence and give an account to him of our stewardship! What a cleansing there would be in our lives! How the things that now absorb our thoughts and engross our efforts would shrink into nothingness in his nearness! Yet it is not certain that even a year will elapse before he comes. All that he said indicates that it will be at a time when he is least expected. "As a thief comes in the night, so will his coming be." As the apostle reminded the Thessalonians, no man who calls himself by Christ's name should be unprepared. The warning has been given in the most solemn manner for the very purpose of producing constant readiness; and to us, as to them, is the word given, "What I say unto one I say unto all, watch."

THE AGE OF NIAGARA

IN an article in the current number of The American Antiquarian, Prof. C. H. Hitchcock, LL.D., gives some very instructive estimates of the age of the famous Niagara Falls. He says:

Assume the present rate of recession to be four feet annually. This is less than what has been observed, but some think that the time for the wearing action must have been greater and the omission of the half foot may be nearer the true figure. There is a greater thickness of limestone at the Johnson ridge than elsewhere, in the first section of the gorge, from the falls to near the railroad bridges, and possibly more time would be required for its erosion. But it seems as if this excess of thickness was removed in pre-glacial times, because the flat produced by the ancient bed of the river, before the erosion of the rock had been effected, slopes uniformly, without regard to the presence of the ridge. Hence this excess of rock has not materially affected the rate of erosion here. The total length of this first section of the gorge is 11,750 feet. This measurement was made in 1875, and the gorge must now be over one hundred feet longer, making the entire length 11,850 feet. Divide this by four, the number of feet the cataract recedes annually, and the quotient is 2,962; i.e., the beginning of the great cataract dates back to 1062 B.C., three hundred years before the time of Romulus, or to the reign of King David at Jerusalem.

The next section is that of the Whirlpool Rapids, 3,900 feet. If the water of Niagara came from Lake Erie alone, under existing conditions, its volume would have been three-fourths of the present flow. This is less than the volume of the water pouring over the American Fall, which recedes 0.64 of a foot annually. This stream may be conceived to wear away the rock at the rate of six inches annually. If so, it would have required 7,800 years for the formation of the gorge of the Whirlpool Rapids.

Professor Spencer has calculated the age of the lower section of the gorge from Lewiston to Foster's Island to be 17,200 years, upon the assumption that the conditions would be those of the American Falls. But measurements of the breadth below the Cove section give an average of width of the top of the gorge fully equal to that of the upper gorge as far as to the Catholic College, 5,754 feet, while the other part, 8,448 feet, may for convenience be comparable to the American Falls. Calculations upon these bases give 1,438 years for the upper part, and 5,406 years for the lower, a total of 6,844 years.

Professor Spencer's estimate of the age, including the Whirlpool, but not the St. David's Channel, sums up 31,000 years, to which he adds a thousand years for the duration of the river before the advent of the Falls. Sir Charles Lyell gave the figure of 36,000; Professor Warren Upham, 10,000, and F. B. Taylor would estimate it to lie between 36,000 and 50,000.

ARCHITECT'S FOOD.

Grape-Nuts Turned into Big Buildings.

The duties of an architect are so multitudinous, looking after the thousand and one details required in the construction of large buildings, that many of them suffer from the constant mental application and require the bit of food to keep up their work. The chief draughtsman in the office of R. T. Newberry, Architect, at 1227 New York Life Building, Chicago, by name, Henry C. Hengels, says:

After nine months' constant application in the preparation of the necessary plans and details for the large hotel known as the Elst Tavern and the Post Building, at Battle Creek, as well as several other large institutions, I found myself in a very debilitated and deplect condition and unfit for work.

Instead of medical treatment, I used Grape-Nuts food in place of the usual breakfast cereals. The first few days gave great encouragement, and after a week's use, quite appreciable improvement manifested itself. See then, daily use has entirely restored the digestive functions to their natural healthy condition, and I have gained about one pound per week. I am now entirely well and strong again, and am able to apply myself to work more than usual vigor. I consider Grape-Nuts most valuable food for all brain workers. The help this food has given me is incalculable.

From Mission Fields Afar

Missionary Frease Better

IN a letter from Mrs. Frease, wife of the Rev. Mr. Frease, Secretary of our Inter-denominational Missionary Committee in India, dated at Bombay, Dec. 15, the writer gives an encouraging account of her husband's health, he having but lately recovered from a severe attack of fever. Though convalescent, he is still very weak. He will be taken to the Convalescent Home at Khandalla for recuperation.

Though confined to his invalid chair, Mr. Frease does not forget the friends in America whose generous offerings, distributed by his committee, were the means of saving countless human lives. At his request, a copy of the following letter has been forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The original was addressed by the Private Secretary of the Viceroy to Hon. W. T. Fee, United States Consul in Bombay.

Dear Sir,—The Viceroy has the greatest pleasure in adding his testimony to those which he understands that you are sending to the American people, as to the immense value of the contributions that have been made by the American public to the relief of the recent Indian famine. Whether these contributions have taken the form of money, or clothing, or grain, they have sprung from the two noblest of human sentiments, viz., the feeling for suffering manhood, and the recognition of a common aid between the two great branches of the English-speaking race, and they have exercised a positive and material influence in the mitigation of the greatest calamity with which India has been afflicted for many years. I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

WALTER LAWRENCE,
Private Secretary to the Viceroy.

Her Children to be Missionaries

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will remember the sad news of the death of the Rev. Mr. Hudson, a faithful missionary worker in the India famine field, several months ago. Mrs. Hudson and the children left India shortly afterward for England, where they now are. In a letter to the proprietor of this journal, dated from Ilfracombe, Devonshire, England, Mrs. Hudson writes:

Your kind letter reached me here, with check enclosed, for which I thank you very much, also for your words and feelings of sympathy toward us. I must also thank you for sending the organ to our little church in India. That country will always be dear to me. I would never have left it, had it not been for my delicate children; but now I trust to bring them up to follow in their dear father's footsteps, as missionaries in that dark land. The missionaries write to me that the future still looks dark for the poor dear people of India.

Missionaries Amid War

Mrs. A. P. Norwood, a devoted missionary worker in Colombia, S. A., whose letters have appeared at different times in these pages, writes from Bucaramanga, telling of the dangers and privations endured by the missionaries during the war now going on in that country. She says:

For weary months, now a full year, we have been cut off from mail privileges by this cruel war. We have been in the very hotbed of the revolution. From our present residence we can look upon two battlefields. Pestilence has followed on the heels of war, and our home has not escaped. Some of our poor friends lost every one of their children, more from starvation than from the prevalent disease. We have been almost crazed at times by the numerous appeals for help, far beyond our means. Our own home has been a small hospital, house of refuge and orphanage, and we are hoping to receive aid to establish a larger home for the many children, whom the sword, pestilence and famine are depriving of home and protection.

Influence of a Pious Example

Hon. R. Holmes, a member of the Canadian Parliament, relates this incident of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Canada's leading statesman:

Some one asked Sir Wilfrid Laurier how it came that he was so broad in his views and tendencies towards others. His answer, in effect, was as follows: "Up to the age of eighteen I could speak nothing but French, and I hired out with a Scotch farmer in order to learn English. Every morning this good man held family worship, and the different members of the household read in turn a verse of the Bible. In the course of time I was invited to remain with the family while morning service was held, and I had every opportunity of judging of the sterling and consistent character of that good farmer and his family, and I must admit that the impressions I there received have remained with me through life, and have undoubtedly influenced me more than I know." One of the members of that particular family is now the wife of Rev. T. G. Williams, of St. James' Methodist Church, Montreal.

"Substitution"

is often an effort to get rid of unsalable goods—things that have been forced on the dealer by schemes which promise excessive profit.

Such washing powders are urged in place of Pearline.

When a woman gets a useless imitation, on the assurance that it's "the same as" or "as good as" Pearline, she's pretty likely afterward to do her trading somewhere else.

Don't argue the matter—use Pearline.

Questions of the Week

1. Is a country under good laws and a bad ruler better or worse off than a country under a good ruler and bad laws?

History repeats itself over and over again when it tells us that a country is in its worst plight when it has a bad ruler yet good laws. In the will of every bad man, there are good laws which seek to govern his life, such as intuition, conscience and common sense, but because he is bad, he will disobey their commands and cancel their authority, and the heart will become a throne on which wickedness will reign. So in a country. Even if it has good laws, they will be of no use and effect, because its bad ruler will either cease to put those laws into action or substitute bad ones in their place. A nation imitates its ruler. France was warlike, because Napoleon was warlike; and England was vicious, because Charles II. set it the fashion; on the other hand, even if a country is groaning under injustice and bad laws, if it is governed by a good ruler, he will remove the national burdens to relieve his people. A good ruler will not long tolerate bad laws, but will write on the statute book the law of God which is written in his own heart. When Queen Victoria ascended the throne of Britain, there were many bad laws on the scrolls of Parliament, which, through her influence, have been removed. R. T. E.

A good ruler, handicapped by bad laws, cannot make his influence felt, and compelled as he is to enforce them, he cannot be but a bad governor, so far as the happiness of his people is concerned. His personal goodness can reach only a few—the evil laws affect all. But a country ruled by just laws will have laws which will restrain a bad executive to the extent of making him practically harmless. While the dignity of the State and many who come into contact with him may suffer under his administration because of his personal character, the people at large cannot be particularly disaffected by his misdoing—they may, indeed, assuming just laws, remove him from office for due reason. A man at the head of a nation is of less importance than the power vested in him. It is better that this power be wisely directed, and the man be bad, than that the man be good and his power wrongfully administered.

JAMES BELL MAJOR.

It is a trite saying that the best way to kill a bad law is to enforce it. A good ruler (that is, a real ruler, and not, as in the case of a republic, merely an executive), having the welfare of his people at heart, would speedily discover the imperfections in the country's laws and would set about to remedy them through the proper legislative channels. Thus the condition of the laws would be gradually improved, with the ultimate result that the laws themselves, like the ruler, would become good and the whole nation would be benefited. On the other hand, a bad ruler with good laws would make a nation drift in the opposite direction. He would surround himself with venal and corrupt advisers. Laws would be neutralized, overridden or neglected, and, if not mangled or repealed, would at last become null and void through continual abuse of the executive power. The ultimate result would be a bad ruler, bad laws, and national degradation and decay.

2. In the event of a child being kidnapped and held for ransom, is a parent right in yielding to the demands of the kidnappers, or should he put his duty to society before personal feelings, by refusing to condone the crime, and making every effort to bring the kidnappers to justice?

The above involves the assumption that "yielding to the demands of the kidnappers" is the only human means in sight to recover the child, the alternative being an empty chair, more terrible to contemplate, by far, than a covered grave! The most notable illustration to the point is the Charlie Ross case, in

Brown, Mrs. C. Sears, L. T. Rightsell, Ruth O. Gray, Carrie Lounsbury, Homer A. Seif, R. W. Thompson, Jean S. Krauth, R. T. Edwards, C. P. Atkinson, L. A. Walker and Eugene W. Parsons.]

3. What should be the course of a Christian wife toward an irreligious and scoffing husband whom she greatly desires to bring to Christ?

1. Avoid controversy. Nothing hardens prejudice and excites pride of intellect more than ill-timed disputes concerning religion.
2. Exercise tact in approaching the subject, and endeavor to win by conciliation and affection. Love will conquer; opposition will insure defeat.
3. The genuineness of the wife's Christianity must be above suspicion, her conduct above reproach. She must constantly exhibit the Spirit of Christ, that the husband may be constrained in his innermost consciousness to say: "She has been with Jesus and learned of him." Above all, specifically and continuously bring the case before God in prayer, both personally and unitedly with friends. Ask for guidance in the use of means, and that the Holy Spirit will "convince of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment to come." One who thus lives and agonizes will doubtless "see of the travail of her soul and be satisfied." CHARLES H. HARRISON.

1. She should pray much for him believing that the prayers on her lips will fall in answers on his heart. 2. She should study him. If he is irreligious and sceptical through early puts a man into helpless fellowship with chance speculators. A Christian should let both alone. C. P. A.

If trusts and Wall street speculations are what they are popularly supposed to be, he cannot. But the popular notion may not be altogether right, or there may be exceptions to the general rule. I can imagine the possibility of a Christian operating in Wall street and maintaining his integrity. He may be only a close observer of the state of markets, buying and selling judiciously, and avoiding all tricks and questionable transactions, by which markets are illegitimately tampered with. As to the formation of trusts, there is a difference of opinion as to the morality of it. Some believe all trusts are bad. But this may not be the case. It may be that the development of certain industries is absolutely dependent on the formation of trusts, impossible of attainment by individual effort. If there are such trusts as these, a Christian may participate in their formation, and perhaps be a better Christian for so doing.

L. T. RIGHTSSELL.

5. When furnishing a "reference" to some employer concerning some person he wishes to engage, am I morally bound to disclose facts derogatory to the person under consideration, or am I justified in keeping silence and simply answering the questions asked?

You should either answer the questions fully and truthfully, and give any other essentially important facts as far as your personal knowledge goes, or else be silent altogether. The appeal to you by another employer, for a reference, is a purely private matter, and as the prospective employer is bound in honor to keep the information you furnish strictly private, so you are equally bound to be truthful with him, and to keep back no vital fact since he places his interest wholly in your hands, trusting you implicitly. If you, by a too generous recommendation, impose upon him a worthless employee, you will very likely have reason to regret it afterward. I have suffered more than once from engaging domestic help on the strength of fulsome and even enthusiastic recommendations from mistresses, who apparently made it a rule to give to every servant whom they dismissed for incompetency or other cause, a certificate of the highest character, and who said nothing of faults which were certain to prove very objectionable. A single qualifying word would have been sufficient, in such cases, to avert the trouble that followed. No doubt, many other readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have suffered the same way. MRS. R. M. B.

You must bear in mind that business men who ask questions about persons they intend to employ ask the important questions they want answered. They better than many others know man's weakness and do not expect to find perfection. Then by all means refrain from tearing down what might be the opportunity of a lifetime, remembering that wealth throws a protection around the business man, and the poor who works for him must stand or fall on the character his friends give him, before trial. If you do anything, go to the party you are recommending; if he has a fault, tell him of it, and warn him that it might cost him a position sometime. T. J. HOWARD.

Unless the person under consideration had committed some grave wrong and was entirely unworthy of the position offered, your answering the questions asked would be sufficient. But if you believe he can and will perform the work required, even though he has not always done the right thing, it would be wrong indeed to say anything that would debar such a one from the expected position. The tendency of the world in general "to kick a man when he's down" is unchristian. When a man is trying to be somebody, lend a helping hand and treat him as a true Christian should—it matters not how low such a person had fallen previously. God help us to lift our fallen brothers! The Best Book for an Unconverted Sailor

The letter of Ethel G. (published in our issue of January 16) has called forth hundreds of suggestions from our readers. In her letter, Ethel G. said:

I have an unconverted brother in the Navy. Send him something to read that will help to save him. Pick out the book yourself, and ask God to help you choose it. He has a Bible, a Testament, and a Hymn-book.

The question was, what book would be most serviceable to him? We invited free suggestions. A book had already been presented, but in order to induce our readers to give the matter careful and prayerful consideration, we agreed to send, for the first answer received in which the choice coincided with the book already sent, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, bound in genuine smooth calf, and lined with moire silk, and to the two next best answers, not making the same selection, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, bound in genuine seal, with calf lining. No answers to be received after February 1. The names of the three persons entitled to the Red Letter Testaments will be printed next week. On January 24 the suggestions stand as follows:

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS	147	THE WAY TO GOD	25

which, "refusing to condone the crime," wrecked a family, killed the mother, lost the boy and the kidnappers went free. Per contra, the most notable case is that of Cudahy. The writer is practically on the ground and in contact with the detectives and others. Suppose that the father had "put his duty to society before personal feelings," and refused to yield, "making every effort to bring the kidnappers to justice," what would have resulted? 1st. I doubt not the mother would to-day be in an asylum for the insane or in her grave; the father and little girls in a pitiable condition and the poor boy killed outright, or, in the rage and chagrin of the defeated wretches, turned loose, horribly mutilated for life! 2d. Aside from the above, there would have been no clue for tracing the scoundrels. As it is, notwithstanding the blunders made so far, Pat Crowe and his helper will surely be brought to justice, and state legislatures will speedily correct the surprising error of the past, and make ample provision for punishment by death or life imprisonment for the perpetrators of such fiendish crimes.

J. H. SCHENCK.

It is not right for a parent to yield to the demands of a kidnapper, for by so doing he encourages and tempts others to engage in the practice of one of the worst of evils. In one sense, some other man's child is worth just as much as the child who has been kidnapped. The good of one's country and the world should be before the good of one's child. God let his Son die for the good of the world.

training, environment or heredity, as well as the natural depravity of his nature, remember that he is most unfortunate, and give him more pity than lectures, and more sympathy than rebuke. Know his doubts and meet them, not in the spirit of debate, but of love and enlightenment. If she plays the coward, he will increase the volume of his laughter.

3. She should not tease him. Why don't you read the Bible? Why don't you come to church? Why don't you go down on your knees in prayer? These words oft repeated will make him worse. 4. If she would bring him to Christ she must make the Christ the most real and attractive person in her home. She must so live that the husband will say, "My wife is more devoted to Christ than to me. She must love him or else she would not go so regularly to church, through dust and mud and snow. She must love him or else she would not read daily about him. She must love him or she would not speak so often to him, nor serve him so faithfully, and since this Christ makes my wife such a good, true-hearted housekeeper and friend, I, too, will serve him." R. T. EDWARDS.

4. Can a man be a Christian and be prominent in the formation of trusts and also speculate in Wall Street?

It seems impossible that an enlightened man could be prominent in forming trusts or speculate in Wall street without necessarily making a compromise with his conscience. For if the particular trust which might at one time be the outgrowth of his efforts should have nothing contrary to right in it, the general system is altogether beyond the control of one man. In active effort to form them he would be fostering and abetting evil in the body politic. To speculate in Wall street also

GOING TO CHAPEL AT NORTHFIELD IN WINTER

W. R. MOODY

ON the second Sunday in February, thousands of churches, Sunday Schools and Young People's Societies throughout the United States will take up collections for an Endowment Fund for the Moody schools at Northfield and Chicago. On the sad day of Mr. Moody's funeral, a number of men of wealth and influence, all Mr. Moody's friends, met in the parlors of the Northfield Hotel, and suggested that the good work begun by Mr. Moody should be perpetuated. After careful consideration and planning, the trustees have now taken steps to raise an endowment adequate to insure the continuance of the life-work of the great evangelist.

Mr. Moody was a man of the people, and his work was for them. This was marked in his evangelistic efforts, as well as in his educational work. The object of his schools was to minister to those who, like himself, had limited means, and in their earlier days few advantages. Thousands of young women at the Northfield Seminary, and of young men at Mount Hermon, have been fitted for useful Christian lives; while the Bible Institute in Chicago has sent out an army of trained lay workers to assist the regularly ordained ministry. Through these means, through the summer conferences, and through Mr. Moody's evangelistic work and his publications, he touched and influenced the religious life of perhaps nearly every Christian in this country.

Developing Christian Character

The object of the Northfield schools has always been rather to develop character than to educate in the limited meaning of the word. "Character is what a man is in the dark," was a definition which Mr. Moody loved to emphasize to his students. "We want at Northfield young men and women whom you have to reach. Some people need only be counted as individuals; but we want young men of character, who will have some weight." This was the object of the work as Mr. Moody himself described it.

It is proposed to ask the great body of Christians of all denominations to take part in this movement to make Mr. Moody's work enduring. It could be largely done by small and moderate contributions from a large number, rather than with large contributions from a few. The sum publicly named by the trustees for an adequate endowment fund is $3,000,000, which would furnish at per cent. an available annual income of $50,000, for the conduct of the work. The three institutions established by Mr. Moody, and now to be endowed, are: The Seminary at Northfield; the Boys' School at Mount Hermon; and the Northfield, and the Bible Institute at Chicago. In order that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD might give its readers a faithful account of the work at these schools, and especially at Northfield, the writer visited that typical and beautiful New England village on the border line between Massachusetts and Vermont, where I passed a delightful and instructive time inspecting were covered with snow. It was very early in the morning, and the wind was bitter cold. The villager who escorted me to the spot lifted his hat reverently as he approached the plain granite slab that rose out of the snow, and I, unconsciously, followed his example. The man was a native of Northfield, and loved the great worker for souls whose mortal frame Schools, long ago, he defined his purpose to be to "help young men and women of very limited means to get an education such as would have done me good when I was their age. I want to help them into lives that will count the most for the cause of Christ," he said. "We want painstaking boys and girls, and the poorer the better." And this object and this wish are being carried out today in every department of the great work at Northfield, as my visit convinced me. These schools are more especially to equip young men and women to solve the problems of their own career by developing whatever talents they possess. Mr. Moody recognized that all studies have their value, and that their importance increased, if pursued in right relation to the great central truths. Hence, the Bible is used at Northfield in such a way as to make it fundamental. It is included in every course, and its truths form the basis of all the studies, which are made very thorough, interesting and practical. There are no denominational lines or interpretations. The end sought is that all shall learn to love the Word, and live by it, and make its truths known wherever their lives may lead them.

A Spiritual Atmosphere

The total cost of tuition, board, quarters, etc., for each student is $200 per year, or $100 for each term. Of this, the student pays one-half, the school the other. A few students "work their way" through, but of course this is not possible for all. In addition to the cash payment made at the beginning of the term, each boy is obliged to do from two to three hours' work a day, and each girl an hour's work; hence only a few paid employees are necessary. The students are made to feel that work is not beneath the dignity of any one. At Mount Hermon they do a part of the work on a farm of 1,015 acres; they also do the blacksmithing, laundry and domestic work; and at the Seminary nearly all the general housework is performed by the girl students. This is valuable training for the practical duties of life, and fosters independence of character, which is advantageous in their future careers.

The entire atmosphere of Northfield is spiritual, and the visitor is impressed with this fact at every point. When I entered Recitation Hall at the Seminary at 9:15 a. m., I found more than 400 girls there, engaged in a service of song. This was followed by the reading of the Scriptures, after which Paul Moody made a short but fervent prayer. We also visited the English Literature class, and the Domestic Science Department, and watched with interest the sewing and cooking classes. The present quarters are overcrowded, especially Recitation Hall. All the work is characterized by a quick intelligence and intense earnestness. On leaving there, I took a the schools, and meeting the students, the teachers, and Mr. Will R. Moody, who is his father's successor in the work.

On the day when I made a pilgrimage to Mr. Moody's grave, on Round Top, where he used so often to address the Conferences in summer time, the hills and the grave itself lay there beneath God's white blanket. Together we stood a moment, bareheaded and silent, beside the resting-place of him who was born, worked and died amid those snow-clad hills, but whose strong spiritual nature had made itself felt throughout the world.

chapel at noon. In this new and beautiful edifice, the last building erected before Mr. Moody's death, the service of the morning was repeated, with the difference that here were all boys, ranging in age from sixteen to twenty-one. Health and the promise of splendid manhood was in every face. Down in the front seats I noticed one or two young Chinamen, a Japanese, an American Indian, a negro, and other foreign-looking faces. But Northfield's mission is not limited to the New England States, nor even to the Eastern States. Last year about 14 per cent. of the students came from States south of the Mason-Dixon line, and 20 per cent. from west of the Alleghenies. Every State in the Union was represented by the students enrolled and inary next term, a graduate trained nurse, who wishes more education in order to study medicine, writes:

I am so sorry not to have known before of such a place where women with limited means could go to study. I could work and save money to enter your school with the object of preparing as quickly as possible for a Regents' examination.

I do hope that I may be accepted, because that is what I have prayed and waited for five years, says another in her letter; and still another writes:

I have graduated from a Normal School and have accepted a position for the winter, but feel such a longing to be where Christ is taught that I cannot be quite happy with my present condition. I desire a knowledge of Christ.

Such girls as these are not likely to waste their opportunities. Most of the girls who go out from Northfield have some share in the world's work. They are teaching in all grades; from the high school to the kindergarten. They are teaching in the South among the negroes and poor whites, and on the plains among the Indians. They are trained nurses, physicians, librarians, secretaries of Young Women's Christian Associations, and matrons in Homes. They are doing city mission work and rescue work, and thirty-four have gone to the foreign mission field. One was martyred in China last summer and two others were shut up in Peking during the siege. Whether at home or abroad, the Northfield girls are trying to live useful, helpful Christian lives.

Many letters from former students speak most gratefully of all that Mr. Moody and Northfield have done for the writers. There is space to quote from but one:

I felt when I read of Mr. Moody's death that I must do something more than I was doing, to take up a little of the work that he had left, so I have taken charge of the Junior Christian Endeavor Society, and am praying God to help me make the way clear to these little ones, and that He will make my life an influence for good. No one can realize what a blessing Northfield was and is to me. Life has seemed different to me ever since my first year in the school, and its influence has been a potent factor for good right along.

The total present endowment of the Seminary is $166,729, but of this the income of only $62,051 is at present available for current expenses. Since its bringing souls to Christ. Wherever he went, he met those who might, with a little well-directed study and training, become efficient lay workers in the Gospel cause; and many who would prove valuable assistants to their pastors in building up and establishing the kingdom of God on earth. "I believe we have got to have 'gap-men,'" he said; "men who are trained to fill the gap between the common people and the ministers. The time has come to call out the volunteers.... The church ought to take these men in hand and give them the chance to do that for which they are fitted. Then there are some kinds of Christian work that men are not fitted for, and which only consecrated and trained women can accomplish." He held several preliminary meetings in Chicago, and the attendance was so large and the results so encouraging that he determined to organize the work on a permanent basis. The Chicago Bible Institute is the result. It was opened on Sept. 26, 1889, "To educate, direct, encourage, maintain and send forth Christian workers, Bible readers, gospel singers, teachers and evangelists, competent effectually to teach and preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ." Its central purpose is the developing and deepening of the spiritual life, and the awakening of a "passion for the salvation of the lost."

Among the students are graduates of colleges and high schools, ministers, evangelists, returned missionaries, and other Christian workers desirous of special study of the English Bible and methods; college students on vacation; men and women who have been called of God into Christian work too late in life to take regular college and seminary courses; others called to special lines of Christian service, and who need a different training from that given to candidates for the regular ministry; men and women who desire a larger message and the inbringing of souls to the kingdom, respond to the call for aid from these schools, and give gladly and liberally for their endowment. If every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who has been thrilled by the great evangelist's presentation of the Gospel in its pages, will give an offering, however small, they will have a share in building a worthy and enduring memorial to one of the grandest and most consecrated servants of the Master our age has known. The work must go on; for it is a divine work, and to aid it now should be regarded as a high privilege precious to every Christian. Let all unite to send out to the waiting world an army of trained spiritual workers from the schools founded by Dwight L. Moody. Send your contributions to D. W. McWilliams, treasurer, 287 Fourth avenue, New York City, who will acknowledge every gift personally by mail.

Countess Schimmelmänn's Work

THE Countess Schimmelmänn sends tidings of "more blessing than ever" on her tour in Germany. She writes: "I see in my meetings the aristocracy, even royalty, mingling with the working classes. The meetings draw great crowds, and we see the most striking conversions." The work is much hindered by the opposition of those who disapprove of women preaching. She, however, braved the situation at Karlsruhe, by hiring the hall and paying all expenses herself. "The result was overwhelming, reaching to the most important persons in Germany." In March she purposes going to England for a period extending over three weeks. Friends desiring to be visited are invited to communicate with the Countess Schimmelmänn, at Villa Helleback, Helleback, Denmark.

It is not yet announced when she proposes to revisit the United States. Readers of this journal and many others interested sixty of the students were of twenty-one different nationalities. The influence of this work is being felt to-day the length and breadth of the country, while scores of earnest men and women have returned to their native lands, there to help their countrymen by the Christian influences received by their Northfield training.

The Northfield Seminary affords a precious and much-needed opportunity for young women of limited means to equip themselves for the Lord's service. Hundreds who are now blessing the world in various spheres of Christian activity, owe their efficiency and a very large portion of their success to Northfield. It makes of them good workers and cheerful Christians. Forty-seven of the girl-students now in the Seminary are paying their way wholly or partly with money they have earned, and fifty others are helped from various sources. One hundred and thirteen worked at Northfield during the summer to help pay their way, and thirty-two others are now doing laundry work in the institution several hours each week for the same purpose. Among the students are many who are orphans, or either fatherless or motherless. Many are farmers' daughters, daughters of clerks and mechanics, of missionaries and of ministers with small salaries. Still others have had the advantage of homes of wealth, but reverses have come which have brought changed conditions.

One young woman who is to enter the Sem-foundation in 1879, when D. L. Moody began with twenty-five young women, whom he had quartered in his own house, 2,830 students have been enrolled. The Mount Hermon school has a total endowment of $339,751, of which only $272,054 is at present available for current expenses. Since its foundation in 1881, when Mr. Moody started it in a farm-house with twenty-five boys, 3,169 students have been enrolled. Although the first emphasis has always been upon character-training, the scholarship of the Northfield schools has not suffered in consequence. With ambitious students such as the young men and women at Northfield, this is as it would be expected. Testimonies have been received from many leading colleges to this effect. The president of a prominent Eastern college recently told a member of the faculty at Mount Hermon that the men who came to his college from Northfield "had come to expect as a natural thing that they would be honor men in scholarship, and they could always count on their standing for righteousness."

Besides the Northfield schools, the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, where thousands have been trained for Christian work, will also be helped by the proposed Endowment Fund. This branch of the great evangelist's work has been a mighty power for Christianity. He was impressed by the evident need of men and women who should understand the Word of God and know how to use it in intelligently and successfully in winning others to Christ. During the last ten years, no less than 1,985 students have been enrolled in the Men's Department; 956 in the Women's Department; 202 are now actively engaged in home and city and rescue missions; 108 are engaged in evangelistic work as preachers and singers.

Students and teachers together in all three of the Moody institutions are working to raise money for the Memorial Endowment. They have, up to the present time, raised a little more than $7,000, and are hoping to make the sum much larger this year. Already the Memorial Fund has received generous contributions from people all over the country, amounting to perhaps $100,000. As February 5, is the anniversary of Mr. Moody's birth, the Sunday following has been chosen as a fitting day for concerted action in the matter of collections in the churches and Sunday Schools throughout the Union.

Many readers of this journal in past years have been warm supporters of Mr. Moody's evangelistic work, which has been a means of grace to a countless multitude of souls. The opportunity is now afforded to all to aid in perpetuating the work he founded, and to which he devoted a great part of his life. These schools for the training of Christian men and women for effective service in spiritual fields should be generously sustained by God's people everywhere. Let all who desire an active part in the spreading of the Gospel acquaintance with the Bible and the approved methods of Christian work, so that, while pursuing their secular callings, they may also labor in evangelistic work, remember with pleasure the work done by the Countess in her Gospel yacht the Duen, on the American lakes, as well as her wonderfully effective spiritual addresses in a number of our larger cities.

Our Medal for Heroism

AS announced in previous issues, the proprietor of this journal purposes to award, once a week, a medal for the most meritorious case of personal bravery occurring during each week in the year. The first medal awarded will be for the most deserving act of heroism taking place in the first week of January, 1901; the second medal, for a similar act in the second week of January, and so on through the year. Every reader is invited to forward to us earliest information of any deed of true heroism that has occurred in his locality since January 1st. Send accounts only of thoroughly authentic cases, and tell the story from personal knowledge, not from hearsay. A committee in New York will meet once a week and, on investigating the facts presented, will decide which case is most deserving of recognition. The reward is not for heroism in the line of paid professional duty, but for that which is absolutely voluntary and spontaneous, and without emolument. Give the exact date, as only cases happening on or after January 1, 1901, will be considered. To give the committee time to satisfy all inquiries, to investigate all claims, and to allow time for stamping the medal, some weeks must elapse after the event before the medal can be awarded. Address all letters on this subject to Chairman Medal Committee, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

A · WESTERN · LEAGUE · OF · SOUL · WINNERS ·

IN these days of intense and far-reaching Christian activities, those who take delight in doing the Master's work are finding scope for their energies in many new and unexpected ways. A most novel and picturesque phase of spiritual work has recently been brought to the attention of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Prof. C. A. Leonard, Cynthia, Ky., and the account published below demonstrates how richly blessed such a work may be, even though begun in a most humble way, and under many disadvantages.

In December, 1897, a little company of Christian men and women in eastern Kentucky, organized "The Society of Soul Winners," for the purpose of conducting evangelical work among the mountaineers of the Appalachian range. They chose as their motto: Prov. 1:30: "He that winneth souls is wise." Beginning with a single evangelist, they have now fifty on their roll of workers, and the society itself has a membership of over 500 who contribute toward its support. Every member aims to win at least one soul a year for Christ. They represent almost every Christian denomination and are scattered throughout the entire region. No salaries are paid to officers of the society, and the only expenditures are those necessitated by actual evangelistic service in the field. The area of operations covers 86,000 square miles of mountains—the broad and beautiful expanse of our country stretching east of the Mississippi, from Pennsylvania to Alabama. This region is inhabited by over two and a half millions of people, most of them white and descendants of Scotch-Irish and Anglo-Saxon ancestors. Want of means has deprived them of the blessings of education and religion. Thousands have neither, and no opportunity to get them; many have never seen a church and never heard a Gospel they could understand.

The Society of Soul Winners is evangelical and interdenominational. It organizes no ministers, organizes no churches. It is supported entirely by voluntary contributions. The churches which grow out of its labors are organized by the various denominations to which converts wish to attach themselves. Only the most consecrated and efficient evangelists are employed, and these are paid only a living salary, monthly. Not one has ever received over $30 per month; some work faithfully on half that amount. Four generous contributors are each supporting an evangelist at a cost of thirty dollars a month; but most of the society's offerings will give an idea of its effective methods of work: "I went to Crockettville (Breathitt County), in April, 1899, taking Mrs. Saunders and Mrs. Gordon, of Woodford County, along. Our first intention was to get a class of girls to sewing on clothes for the poor. We found there were many who would come to us for this, but they had no suitable wearing apparel for themselves; so we put dresses we had have known before, and there are no more kindly and hospitable people on the globe than these. No foreign element has entered here since their ancestors came in through gaps out of the valleys of Virginia and the Carolinas. They are a very finely developed people physically. The men are quiet, cool, brave, and generous to improvidence. The children are as bright and teachable as any we have known. We respect them and love them. They are without an adequate knowledge of the Gospel."

It was slow work at first, but the teachers persevered at Crockettville. Many have been converted. Six godly and accomplished women have given their time, their energy and their prayers to this work among the children, without further material recompense than their board, which is provided by the "Soul Winners' Society." "We think this is the way to evangelize the mountains," says Dr. Saunders.

The following officers control the affairs of the society: President, Rev. Edward O. Guerrant, D.D., Wilmore, Ky.; Vice-President, Rev. Wm. C. Clark, D.D., Augusta, Ky.; Secretary, Leonard H. Willis, Sr., Nicholasville, Ky.; Treasurer, Major Robert S. Bullock, cashier Fayette National Bank, Lexington, Ky.

Our portraits on this page show some of the leaders in the work of the Society of Soul Winners. One illustration gives an excellent idea of Rev. Dr. Guerrant's tent, known as the "Tabernacle on the Quicksand"—the latter being the name of a tortuous stream in eastern Kentucky. The Presbyterian Church at Crockettville, organized in 1899, was an outcome of the League's work.

The Society exerts an influence which is constantly extending. It is a remarkable example of the power of consecrated Christian effort in a little-known corner of the great Gospel harvest-field.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

S. B. A., Pennsylvania, writes:

Several weeks ago I took a great trouble to God in prayer. Answer was not immediate, but I was persistent; I had faith, and felt that the reply would come. The answer came and now prayer to me is a different service from before. I consider it as a confidential talk with God; and if I am perplexed or worried now, I tell him of it and always feel the better for so doing.

Mrs. E. F. S. writes:

For three months I mourned for my only and dearly loved son, not knowing whether he was dead or alive, but prayed that God would show us where he was, or influence him to write to us if alive, for all human efforts to find him were unavailing. And after saying and feeling, "Thy will be done," I received a letter from him. I firmly believe God influenced him to write.

"Thankful," Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

I was in deep trouble, friends disowned me, every one's hand seemed raised against me, and there appeared to be no help for me anywhere. I went to God and he heard me; all came to my aid, and I was saved from prison. I promised that I would acknowledge his divine mercy, and hope you will publish this, so that some other poor soul tortured with sin will pray and ask to be delivered.

A Subscriber, Halifax, N. S., writes:

I prayed and worked earnestly for a dear one's conversion, and at times almost felt like giving up; but reading of answered prayers in your paper I took courage. Thank God that loved one decided the beginning of the new year to follow Christ.

C. P. S., Cassopolis, Mich., writes:

God has many times answered my poor petitions. Once, "while I was yet speaking," the answer came. Now what I am daily asking for he is daily answering.

Mrs. G., Port Huron, Mich., writes:

Some months ago a burden came upon us. I prayed earnestly, read my Bible, and asked to be taught to pray aright; then came the answered prayers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which I read each week; they strengthened me not to give up. I trusted faithfully, and Christ has opened up the avenue whereby our trouble will pass away.

M. A. M., South Amboy, N. J., writes:

I wish to express my deep gratitude to God for many prayers answered. When my way was dark and no way out, the dear Father opened the door and relief came. Believing prayer brings blessings. Encouraged by the answers to prayer in your paper, I wish to add my testimony to encourage some poor, troubled soul.

Letters acknowledging answers to prayer have also been received from Mrs. W. L. Sturgeon Bay, Wis.; J. B. Homestead, Pa.; E. L. S., Ingalls, N. C.; Mrs. J. H. C., Ruthven, Ont.; I. A. ALL IS WELL

A SERMON BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

TEXT, Isaiah 3: 10:
Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him . . .

THERE is a promise for people who are all right, but who will come and get it? How many, or rather, how few people do you know who are all right? If it were asked of any assembly that those who were sinless should rise up, none would rise except imbeciles and religious cranks. An accident happened near sixty centuries ago that started the human race in the wrong way, and we have not got over it. We know a great many splendid men and splendid women, but they will tell you that they have not always done the right thing, or thought the right thought. If it were any of your business, they could give you an inventory of frailties and mistakes and infelicities that would be astonishing. Here, then, you say, is a Bible promise that goes a begging: "Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him."

It is my delightful work to-day to show you that all the sons and daughters of Adam and Eve may appropriate the benediction of my text if they will first do the right thing. Over here in the next street was a man who in great misfortunes lost all he had and was positively beggared, but a letter comes from some European city, where the land records are kept, announcing to him that a great fortune is his. Now he is as opulent as he was pauperized. He doffs his rags and puts on respectable attire and moves into a home appropriate for a man of vast estate. His worldly circumstances were all wrong last year; they are all right this year. On the next street is a man who was from perfect health prostrated, and he seemed to be sick unto death, but a skillful physician took correct diagnosis of his disease, and by prompt and vigorous treatment restored him to his former vigor. As to his health he was all wrong before; now he is all right. In these two ways I illustrate my theme.

A Comforting Promise

By sin we have all been morally bankrupted. Christ, the Lord, from his infinite riches pays our debts and emparadises us in his mercy. From his richest wardrobe he puts on us the clean robe of his righteousness and gives us a palace in the heavens when we are ready to go up and take it. Now, as to our spiritual estate we are all right. We were morally diseased, but Christ the physician, by a bath in the fountain of his grace, cures us. Now, as to our spiritual health we are all right. That is the way we come to the righteousness spoken of in the text. It is a contributed righteousness, a made-over righteousness, an imputed righteousness. The moment you get into right relations with Christ the Lord, that moment you can appreciate the magnificent comfort of the text, and I defy you, in all this great Book, from the first verse of the first chapter of Genesis to the last verse of the last chapter of Revelations, to find me a passage with higher and deeper and broader and longer comfort than that of the text, which is as deep as the Atlantic ocean half way between the continents, and high as the sun when the clock is striking twelve at noon. But I shall be swamped with the oceanic tides of this subject unless the Lord help me to keep a foothold. "Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him."

Bear in mind that but few people can stand worldly success. Water is a good thing, but too much of it will drown. Fire is a good thing, but too much of it will destroy. Light is a good thing, but too much of it dazzles and blinds. Success is a good thing, but too much of it has overwhelmed many for this world and the next. If it were best for us, we would all be millionaires, live in palaces like the Alhambra, and be as personally attractive as Cleopatra appeared to Antony. But the most of folks could not endure such superabundance, and it is absolutely necessary, in order to keep them right, that nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of a thousand should find life a struggle. It keeps them out of mischief. After Adam was ejected from the premises where by ten minutes of employment a day he could keep the garden and dress it, the best thing that could happen to him was compulsion to work and fight. The ground that bloomed with spontaneous flowers and rustled with harvests that owed nothing to plow or hoe, became hostile, and bramble was substituted for rose, and the panther growled where before he fawned, and horn and fang and hoof became belligerent. That Edenic ejection shows us, as nothing else ever could, that idleness or only a few minutes of employment a day are doom and overthrow. Put it down among your blessings instead of your misfortunes that you have to work hard with brain or hand or foot, or all three of them.

Non-Essentials

How many men do you know worth $250,000 who are devout and consecrated and humble and generous and employing their means for the world's redemption? You could count them up on the fingers of your two hands, even if by accident or war you had lost one or two of the fingers. As to the realm of personal attractiveness, how many women radiant of countenance and graceful of form do you know who are unaffected, and natural of manner, and deeply pious before God, using their beauty for the betterment of the world and not for selfish purposes? I only take the risk of asking the question, and leave to you the risk of answering it. These things I say to show you that in order to have the promise of the text fulfilled in your case it is not necessary you have phenomenal worldly success.

Notice, also, that God gives the righteous the power to extract good out of evil, and by a divine chemistry to change the bitter into the sweet, and the harmful into the beneficial. The promise that it shall be well with you does not imply that you are to be free from trouble. There is no escape from that. We all have family relations, and some of them will be making exit from this world, so that bereavement is the universal inheritance. So, also, is financial loss. The difference between the prospered and those not prospered, is the difference in the amount they can afford to lose. The more wealth a man has, the more he can lose; but one man can afford to lose a million dollars, where another man cannot afford to lose one dollar. On larger or smaller scale, all suffer financial loss. Amid the rapidity of the revolutions of the wheel of national and international finance, monetary perplexity is as common as day or night.

Trouble Alleviated

So, also, misinterpretation and slander come to all who live active lives. Our actions, thoroughly honest and above board, may come under suspicion. Every court room at every term of court hears illustrations of the delusion of what is called circumstantial evidence. Innocent men are fined, or imprisoned, or electrocuted, because of an unfortunate conjunction of events. What is true in court rooms, is true in all circles of domestic, or social, or political, or official life. You have been misunderstood and misrepresented, or will be misunderstood or misrepresented. Then, how can my text be true? My explanation is this: The man without any divine grace in his heart finds in these troubles irritation and unbelief and melancholia and despair. A Christian man finds in them submission and enlarged views and divine support and reconsecration. Bereavement to the worldling brings hard thoughts of God, and a resistance so violent it dares not fully express itself. Bereavement brings to the Christian the thought of heavenly reunion and a more complete laying hold of God, and a more tender appreciation of the divine presence, and deeper gratitude that we were permitted to have the departed one so long, and a more lively sympathy for the sorrows of others, and another evidence of God's love, for "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth."

The Golden Mean

Financial loss, which I just now said is sure to come, never breaks up a man who has strong faith in God. In most cases it is a loss of surplus or it is the banishment of luxuries. Most of the wants of the prosperous classes are artificial wants. The late Mr. Armour, of the sixty-million dollar estate, pointed to one of his clerks on ordinary salary and said: "That man has better appetite than I, sleeps better nights, and enjoys life more than I do." O, the gigantic miseries of those who have too much! A man in Solomon's time expressed as philosophic and reasonable a wish as any man of those times or of our times. His name was Agur, and he offered a prayer that he might never have a superabundance or a deficit, crying out, "Give me neither poverty nor riches." On the one side he had seen the awful struggle of the poor to get food and clothes and shelter and to educate their children, and on the other side he had seen the gouty foot, and the indigestion, and the insomnia, and the anxiety about large investments, and the threatened paresis often characteristic of those who are loaded up and loaded down with too many successes. Those people who are generally called the masses—that is, the most of folks—have the things absolutely necessary for their well-being. They have no Murillos on their wall, nor a Belshazzar's Feast in their dining room, nor a pair of three-thousand dollar sorrels at their doorway. But they have something which those superabundantly supplied seldom have. They have better health, because being compelled to walk they get the necessary exercise, and their diet being limited to plain food, they do not suffer from midnight salads, and are not victimized by rare caterers. They retire for wholesome sleep at the very hour in which others are leaving their homes for the dance or the card party. They will sleep the last sleep just as well in the plain graveyard as those who have over them an arch of sculptured granite in costliest necropolis or most historical abbey.

Things are more equally divided than is generally supposed. That splendid home is apt to have a taking off of some kind. It may be an invalid wife, or a deformed child, or an inherited tendency toward insanity, or a dissolute son, or a despoiled reputation, or a weakened heart that may halt under the least excitement. Envy no man. Envy no woman. Be content with such things as ye have. Do not think that in order to have it well with you according to my text, that therefore you must have more than somebody else, or even as much as somebody else. The Lord treats us all better than we treat Him, and if we would

as much as we study our disasters we would be more reasonable and thankful. In Isaiah God says that bread and water shall be sure, and none of us have been put on so low a diet; but we often act as though God had not kept his promise because we want more luxuries, forgetful of the fact that he promised bread, not cake; water, not sparkling cordials.

The reason so many people are miserable is because they do not let well enough alone. They are in one occupation and see its annoyances, and so change to another occupation, and find as many annoyances, if not more. They live one place and know its uncomfortable environments, and move into another place which has just as many limitations. Their investments yield them four per cent., and they sell out to make investments that will yield ten per cent. and lose all. Better settle down and stop fretting about yourself and the world.

An officer in Cromwell's time was worried about public affairs that he could not sleep. His servant, a Christian man, said he would like the privilege of asking the officer a question. Leave being granted, the servant said: "Do you not think that God governed the world very well before you came into it?" "No doubt it," was the reply. "And do you not think he will govern it quite as well when you are gone out of it?" "Certainly." "Then pray, sir, excuse me—but do you not think you may trust him to govern it as long you live in it?" The remark was sensible that sleeplessness departed and tranquillity came.

The Father's Provision

A particular Providence is as certain as a general Providence. It did not just happen so that Brunel noticed a shipwreck boring into the wood, so suggesting the engineer the tunneling of the Thames. It did not just happen so that a spider web strung from tree to tree suggested the suspension bridge to its first originator. Nothing just happened so in your life or mine. It is not an autocrat at the head of the universe, but a Father.

Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea.

Do any of us fully realize the fact that God gives us three things in unlimited supply, although no formula of prayer that I ever heard recognizes them—water, air, and sunlight? Water by the river, Water by the lake, Water by the ocean. Some for ablution, some for slaking of thirst, some for baptistry, some for fountains and aquariums. I never appreciated what a wonderful thing water was until last summer I stood by the fountain before and around the Emperor's palace at Peterhof, Russia. I had been familiar with this wonderful element of nature from childhood, having been born on the banks of the beautiful Raritan, and as a barefooted boy dabbled in the brook near my father's house. But I never realized until last summer what water could do, play, or in strange caprice, or beautification, or when climbing the ladder of light, or when skillful workmen took hold of it to toss it, or whirl it, or shape it into crowns, or hoist it into columns, or spritz it into arches, or lift it into stars, or turn it into crescents, or build it into temples. You forget you ever saw the less glorious waters at Chatsworth, England, or Versailles, France, as you stand in the balcony of the palace, overlooking the Fland gulf, bewildered and transported you look at the one display called

The "Golden Stairway Fountain"

The water rolls down over steps, a foot high and twenty feet long. All these twenty-four steps are covered with sheets of burnished gold. Silver steps, the water on stairs of gold! What a glaze of liquids! Rolling, dashing, foaming, enrapturing splendors! Chorus of floods! Poetry of waters! Doxology of torrents! But that which most impressed me there and elsewhere is the abundance of water, the fact that there are so many waters that the continents can afford to throw them away into the sea, Hudsons, Rhines, Ohios, Oregons and Amazons, Rhine and Danubes and Volgas; and so abundant that the earth can afford to have oceans evaporate into the heavens, Mediterranean, and Atlantic, and Pacific. How rich the earth is with waters! Be-beverage of all the nations, for after the richest banquet with the richest beverages, every one wants at least a sip of it—water, cool water, God-descended water!

With still more abundance is the air distributed. An earth full of it. A sky full of it. Swiftest and strongest eagle cannot fly so high as not to have it in the nostril or under the wing. And what affluence of sunlight! No one but the infinite God could dispense so much of it. The golden candlestick set on the blue mantle of the heavens! So great that the Almighty is compared to it, the Psalmist crying out: "The Lord God is a sun." It is high time that we recognize in our liturgies and in our formulas of prayer the three most abundant blessings of the universe which come to all.

Well For the Next World

Now, is it not time that we all began more thoroughly to trust the Lord? We trust him with our souls, why not trust him with our bodies? We trust him with our spiritual interests, why not trust him with our temporal interests? We believe what is said to us by an ordinarily honest man. I could not anger you so much or make your cheeks so burn with indignation as to doubt your truthfulness, and how do you suppose the Lord of heaven and earth feels when you doubt him, as he declares in the text: "Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him." Such a promise as that ought to calm your pulses and irradiate your countenance and halo all the future with rapture; for, after all, it makes but little difference what becomes of us here if we come out at the right place, amid the right surroundings, and in the right companionship.

We learn here only the A B C of a higher literature, or the simple addition and subtraction of an infinite mathematics, and are practicing the eight notes of an eternal harmony. The most important question any man ever asks is, "What will be my destiny?" "Whither am I bound?" "Where shall I land?" "What is the terminus of this short journey?" Now, child of God, do not worry about that. It shall be well with you in your next state of existence. We know but little about heaven. There is but little concerning it in the Bible, and that is on the last few pages, and is mostly figurative. I can make only a rough draft of your celestial residence, but I can authoritatively state that the world to which you are destined is a big world, a brilliant world, a sinless world, a joyful world, an endless world, and a world in touch with other worlds. I rejoice to know that heaven is in touch with other worlds for their improvement, and a depot for glorious arrivals. It is a thoroughfare between this world and that world, and a coming and going perpetual. Going out of this world is as natural as coming into it, but the one is with pang and the other is with rapture, if we are fitted for the uplifting process. It shall be well with you. Now, do not get so frightened about that asthma, or that cough, or that influenza, or that threatened pneumonia. The worst thing that fatal disease can do is to usher you into coronation and enthronement. It shall be well with you. Take as good care of your health as you can, have the best doctors you can employ, observe all sanitary laws, keep in this world as long as you are permitted to stay, and then when the heavenly call comes be glad to go. I do not care much about what your "last words" are going to be. People put too much emphasis on "last words." I would rather know what your words are now, in days of health and with mental faculties in full play—your words of kindness, your words of sympathy, your your words of prayer. So live that if you say not a word during the last day of your life there will be no doubt here about the place of your destination. You will go right into saintly, prophetic, evangelistic, apostolic, cherubic, seraphic, archangelic, deific presence. It shall be well with you.

Mother, you will go right up into the possession of the babe that the scarlet fever took out of your arms, a sorrow that still stings. You will go into the presence of the old folks, for I hope you are of Christian ancestry, and you will find that they have no dimness of sight or halting gait that requires a staff, for they have taken a draught from the fountain of perpetual youth that springs from under the throne of God. O, the blissful companionship of heaven in which you shall enter! It shall be well with you. I ring this bell of emancipation and triumph. I like the way the sexton rings the bell of the old country meeting-house. I used to stand and admire him pulling the rope of that bell. He rings it a good while, so that every farm-house within five miles hears it. He may halt a moment to take breath and give the sweet sounds time to stir up all the echoes of the distant hills. So my text seems a bell of invitation and victory. I began to ring it in the opening of this discourse. I hope to ring it as long as I live, and may those who come after us keep on ringing it till those farthest off from God shall come into the great temple of Gospel comfort, and all the weary put down their burdens at its altar, and find that peace which the world can neither give nor take away. Three times more I ring it: It shall be well! It shall be well! It shall be well!

THE FIRST GOSPEL BOAT ON THE ORINOCO RIVER

FIRST MISSION HOUSE AT CIUDAD BOLIVAR

THE MISSION BOAT "VERDAD" ON THE ORINOCO

A BUSINESS CORNER IN AN ORINOCO VILLAGE

THE photograph of the little Gospel boat, here presented, is of peculiar interest in connection with missionary work for the "Neglected Continent"—South America, and especially that part of it which lies nearest to the United States—Venezuela.

That country has received but little attention from our great missionary organizations. It is the most accessible from New York of all the South American states, and although it was the first part of the southern continent to be discovered by Columbus, it has been almost the last to receive any notice from the church in North America. Yet the liberty-loving spirit of its people has prepared the way in no little degree for the entrance of the Gospel among them, while its great waterways give accessibility not only to its own interior, but also to Colombia and Brazil.

This little craft was especially designed and built for the Venezuela Mission, a work that was begun in 1897 by Rev. R. W. Crichton, who had previously been in Venezuela as a missionary. Going to that country in January, 1896, Mr. Crichton, after spending some time in Caracas, the capital, traveled overland from the coast to the central interior, and thence to the coast again by water, part of the journey in a native "bungo" and part in river steamers. The work was deeply interesting and the results encouraging. An eager desire was manifested by many to secure a copy of the Bible, which they had never before seen, and an earnest attention was given to the Gospel message.

The great water-courses impressed Mr. Crichton with the need of having a small steam launch for the special purpose of evangelizing the great interior country, most of which was, and still is, destitute of the "Light of the World." Not a single mission station or missionary was met with between the capital city, which is located on the northern coast, and the custom port of the Orinoco River, Ciudad Bolivar, nor is there one to this day. In all Venezuela there are not more than five places, and perhaps even less, where missionaries are stationed, and of those but one is connected with a church board.

Returning to the United States, Mr. Crichton spent much time seeking to interest the Lord's people in the spiritual as the reward of his long and earnest labor. In January, 1899, he went up the river from Ciudad Bolivar, two or three hundred miles, in a small sail-boat, visiting the villages and lonely dwellings along its banks, finding many hungry hearts, leaving them copies of the Scriptures and freely distributing Gospel tracts among solicitation, the money was voluntarily given for constructing, furnishing and shipping the boat to the field, and on January 29th it left New York City on the deck of a steamer.

This little steamboat has been named La Verdad ("The Truth"), in witness to its mission and the message it carries. "Thy word is truth," said the Lord Jesus, and his "Word of Life" will be the message given. Much care and time were taken to secure proper plans for its construction, and it has been designed and built to enable it run up the small streams and also to afford the necessary facilities for living on board. It is forty feet long, ten feet wide, with fifteen inch draft, and is fitted out according to the inspection rules of the United States Government, carrying a life raft, life preservers and a small rowboat, with a stout windlass at the bow and a folding anchor attached to a strong galvanized iron chain. The power is steam, from a water-pipe boiler, driving twin engines and propellers, with the necessary pumps and repairing tools.

The value and utility of this launch will be the more readily seen when we consider that the Orinoco River is reported to have over four hundred navigable tributaries, and upon many of these streams live tribes of people, to whom the glad message has never been told.

There is an urgent call for more workers to enter this great field, and the earnest prayers of all Christian people are desired on behalf of this mission. It is supported entirely by voluntary offerings; it is undenominational, and its aim is to give the plain, simple Gospel of the Word of God, to the people of Venezuela. The secretary and treasurer of the mission is Mr. John Muntz, Box 20, Buffalo, N. Y., and any contributions sent in will be promptly acknowledged by him. Mr. and Mrs. Crichton can be addressed to Mr. Muntz's care, or, if preferred, to Ciudad Bolivar, Venezuela, South America, to the care of the American Consul.

needs of his field, and in the spring of 1897, organized the Venezuela Mission as a work of faith. Since then, he has spent two different periods working along the Orinoco River, sometimes with companions and at other times alone, meeting many difficulties, but ever seeing the mighty hand of a faithful God leading and providing, and seeing also some fruit them. Their deep need and the parting question, "When are you coming back again?" caused his heart to go out anew in earnest desire to God for the steam launch, so much needed to carry on the work in this neglected region. There were months of waiting, with many trials of faith and patience, but in due time, without either public appeal or private

for Feb. 17: Matt. 26: 17-30

GOLDEN TEXT, Luke 22: 19: "This do in remembrance of me"

By...
Dr. and Mrs.
Wilbur F. Crafts

ARE you sure the blood is on the door?" said Joseph, the first-born son, a full-grown young man, in one of the Hebrew slave-cabins of Egypt, as evening approached, that first Passover night. With that he threw himself in sudden illness on the rude bench that served for a bed. His indolent father replied, as he ate his leeks greedily on the mat in the corner: "God knows we are Israelites, and not Egyptians. What is the use of putting up such a sign? Surely he is too good to let his angels hurt anybody for not obeying a little command like that. I'm tired with a hard day's work, and hungry, and there'll be time enough anyway when I'm through eating." "But, father, God also knows what Israelites should do to be saved, and has told us. Surely it is not a little wrong to disobey any command of the great God. And one of his commands is that those who worship him shall confess their sins and their faith at once by the sign of the blood. That means, perhaps, that we deserve to die for our sins, but he accepts the death of the lamb in our stead. Isn't it the best use of our human reason to say to ourselves that God must have the best of reasons for whatever he commands, and that the most reasonable thing for us is to believe that and obey without asking any questions? Besides, father, I'm deathly sick, and getting worse every moment." At that the father, more afraid of his son's death than of the greater perils of a young man's life amid temptations, rises and swiftly kills the lamb that lies tied at the threshold, and sprinkles the blood on the door as the shadow falls of the angel who is carrying death to the first born in every home of the Egyptian capital, which is not marked with the blood sign of faith and obedience. Returning into his hut he finds his son rising from his bench in full vigor and girding himself for the Passover meal they are soon to eat standing, ready for the order of Moses to march out of Egypt toward the Land of Promise, of reaching which they have assurance in the already-fulfilled promise, "When I see the blood I will pass over you." (Read Eber's story of "Joshua," for a more complete picture of the original Passover). That first Passover was a prophecy in action of the emancipation of all souls that should hide at last behind the blood-sprinkled cross of Calvary in the final Passover to which our lesson brings us. It is Tuesday at Bethany, and preparations are to be made for Thursday's Passover supper in Jerusalem, in the shadow of Friday's Cross.

Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the Passover? Why did the Apostles ask such a question, when Christ needed no prompting and knew everything and could plan everything without their aid? Because he needs, and we also need, the verbal expression that shows and increases our desires, as appetite is needed to make food most beneficial. All through his earthly life, when others did not furnish the questions, Christ called out the expression of need by saying, "What wilt thou?" "What shall be done unto thee?" Conversation, of which prayer is its highest form, is not chiefly valuable as a means of getting and giving information and assistance. Its highest use is to help communion of souls by putting thought and especially feeling into words. It serves the heart even more than the brain. Desires, as well as thoughts, grow clearer as we try to tell them out. Adoration and thanksgiving, and even heart-questionings are as helpful as supplication. Emerson's profoundest utterance on education was, that it matters not so much what you study as with whom you study. The best part of prayer is being with God.

Go into the city to such a man. Peter and John, who were commissioned to do this work (Luke 22: 8 ff), wasted no time in questionings and reasonings. They might have argued that it was very unlikely they should find a man bearing a water-pitcher—did he not mean a woman? Or they might have asked the man's name, and on what street they should find him. They simply obeyed without questioning and accomplished their purpose. Such obedience anywhere is a rare treasure, as has been shown in the story, sold by the hundred thousand, of a Lieutenant who was told by the War Department during the Spanish war in Cuba, to "take a message to Garcia." That was all he was told, save the message, and he asked no more. He raised no objections on account of danger or difficulty, asked no questions as to why or wherefore, but used all his wisdom and courage to carry out the command, and succeeded. Which prompted a comparison with thousands less wise and less brave, who in such a case would have either declined to go through fear, or at least would have delayed to ask a hundred questions. What a rare treasure anywhere is soldierly obedience!

Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.

God sends you who are reading or hearing this lesson to some man or boy on the street, whose pitcher, perhaps, is not for water, to tell him God needs his heart and his home. There he desires to have a Lord's Supper at every meal in place of a devil's supper, cursed with drink and discord. In a recent lesson Christ sent a messenger to say to the owner of a young ass, "The Lord hath need of him." This time it is a house which he asks for the use of. Humble or palatial, God needs your home, not alone a place at your table for himself, but for his lowly disciples also, perhaps for young men away from home, living in

One of you shall betray me. . . . Lord, is it I? The house asked for having been prepared on Thursday evening, the Passover was eaten there as in all other homes in Jerusalem. It is to be distinguished from the new Lord's Supper of bread and wine later in the evening, after Judas had left. In the earlier evening, we read of the "sop," "dipped in the dish." There was, no doubt, "roast lamb and bitter herbs," as usual, and a common soup dish out of which all dipped by means of spoons made out of thin, tough bread, resembling brown paper. The soup was swallowed spoon and all each time. It was a special mark of friendship to dip this "sop" and give it to another. Seated at this Passover meal, Jesus said solemnly: "One of you shall betray me." It is rather surprising that all did not say in the usual excess of self-confidence, as Peter did later in the evening, when Christ intimated they would all forsake him in the hour of extreme trial: "Though all should forsake thee, yet will not I." More wisely, each recognized the hidden depths of possible sin in his own heart, and said anxiously: "Lord, is it I?"

Jesus replied, probably in an undertone to John or Peter, that it was one who would receive at his hand the supreme pledge of mutual friendship and fidelity, the sop he would dip and give to declare his love even for his worst enemy. If we could see as

I?" "Would I, too, fail if supremely tested?" If in business I should face a condition where to do right would mean serious loss, or where to do a little wrong would mean a great gain, would I trust in God and do the right? If I were high up in politics, and duty and defeat stood before me hand in hand, dare to fail for Christ? If I should become rich would I permit myself and my family, as so many other church people have done in like case, the questionable if not dangerous amusements and indulgences I now condemn and avoid? If I should move from country to city, would I change my moral standards as much as the once staunch country boys of my early acquaintance have done, that are now merchant princes of our cities?

Surely we all need to fortify our hearts with grace in view of the great number of professed Christians who bear common temptations, but fail in the supreme tests of character. "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" said an Old Testament politician when told he should kill his master. He very soon proved himself the "dog" he blindly thought himself incapable of becoming. "Lord, is it I?"

Here, then, is the very pivot of our lesson: We must fortify ourselves in our best moments against our worst! We must make it hard to do wrong and easy to do right. The vows, and companionships, and sacraments of the church serve that purpose. We shall be less likely to become betrayers of Christ if every month or so or oftener we renew our vows and recall Christ's life and death in the sacramental supper.

This is my body . . . this is my blood. The broken loaf reminds us how Christ's body was broken with nails and spear and thorns on the day following this prophetic supper; but more especially it represents the fact that we may and should receive as "living bread" for the soul, the unselfish, brotherly spirit of Christ, appropriating it so that it becomes a part of our very selves, as food becomes our own blood and bone and marrow. And the wine represents the same more intensely, like a repeated Hebrew parallelism, for the wine stands for the blood which is the life, the life imparted, that was sacrificed for us, and the life imparted, the life of Christ in us.

Commonly we treat the Lord's Supper too much like a funeral, during which we think chiefly of Christ as crucified and buried, and of our own unfaithfulness. Let us recall the many meanings of this symbolic service.

First, the Lord's Supper is a service of remembrance and anticipation.

Second, the Lord's Supper is a "covenant" and a "sacrament." The covenant a reminder of God's promise; the sacrament, of our part.

Third, the Lord's Supper is a communion. It stands not alone for the fellowship of the soul with a living Christ as of one that sups with the King as a friend, but also for the brotherhood of all men as commoners.

Fourth, the Lord's Supper is a Eucharist, a thanksgiving. Jesus gave thanks not alone for the food as was his wont, but even for the cross he gave thanks, though he sometimes shrank from it, and the early church made the service that recalled it, as the Jews did the Passover, a glad celebration of deliverance.

dreary boarding-houses, with no other open door save that of the saloon. You have read the beautiful story of David who took to his royal home and table the cripple Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, who had befriended him as the king's son. If David could so befriend a cripple "for Jonathan's sake," what may we not do in our homes and at our tables for the unfortunate for Jesus' sake! And even for our own folks can we not do more, if not for the body, at least for the soul? Can we not make our suppers point to the Creator and the cross and the coming again?

Your fine horse that has not exercise enough to make him safe for you to drive, "the Lord hath need of him" to bring back to health his sick ones in homes of poverty that are too weak to walk and too poor to ride. Christ needs our prayers, even though they be but questionings, our homes, our property. Beautifully has Dr. Horatius Bonar expressed this great truth that Christ needs us and ours:

Jesus, thou needest me,
Even me, thou light Divine:
O Son of God, thou needest me,
Thou needest sins like mine.

Thy strength, my weakness needs,
Thy grace, my worthlessness;
Thy greatness needs a worm like me
To cherish and to bless.

This evil, froward soul
Needeth a love like thine;
A love like thine, O Christ,
Needeth a soul like mine.

It was thy need of me
That brought thee from above:
It is my need of thee, O Lord,
That draws me to thy love.

Christ sees, we should pity the man who wrongs us, because he wrongs himself more. Judas had become so brazen in the crime into which he had been led gradually by such a love of money as many are cherishing, that he not only received the pledge of friendship, a pledge on his own part also, but said with the others, "Lord, is it I?" "Thou hast said," whispered Christ, and the traitor, knowing his plot was fully discovered, went out, "and it was night." What a "night" his gradual yielding to covetousness had brought upon him, as it has upon so many in our day. A night so black that Jesus said: "It were better for him if he had never been born." Surely that cancels the "eternal hope" of final "restoration." It could not be better for any man not to have lived if he were at last, even after purgatorial punishment, to be ushered into eternal joy and felicity. Even in this world what a "night" of sorrow and disgrace the Judas sin of covetousness has brought on thousands of homes! The saddest women are not those whose husbands or sons are in honored graves, but those whose loved ones are in cells of dishonor. And many a man who has been guilty of "legal thieving," and has escaped prison by some trick or influence, lives in a "night" of self-loathing and popular scorn for which no wealth can atone.

When we look over life and see how many who professed to be, and really seemed to be disciples of Christ, and who, no doubt, in some cases sincerely tried to be, though not with whole-hearted earnestness, have fallen on the field of politics or business or amid the temptations of selfish pleasure, we may well come to Christ with the question, "Lord, is it

Desecrating the Throne

NE of the most painful parts of the punishment inflicted on China for the horrible crimes committed by its statesmen and citizens is the presence of the foreigner in the royal city. That part of Peking in which the royal family lived had never been entered by a foreigner. It was known as "the Forbidden City," and stringent measures were adopted to justify the title. But with the capture of the capital and the flight of the Empress all such measures were futile. The ambassadors, guarded by the international forces, crossed the boundary of the Forbidden City and wandered at will among its palaces and temples. M. Pichon, who represents the French nation at Peking, outdid all the other diplomats by seating himself on the throne heretofore held sacred to the Emperor. This would be an outrage in the eyes of the Chinese, which, under other circumstances, would have been punished with death, no matter how high the rank of the offender. Now, however, the Chinese have to submit to any treatment the allies choose to inflict. The government has striven hard to save the highest wrongdoers from adequate punishment. Prince Tuan, especially, who was chiefly responsible for the massacres, is being shielded by the Empress, who refuses point blank to have him executed. It is gratifying to learn that our Government has used its influence on the side of mercy, though Mr. Long, our ambassador in China, apparently believes that severity alone is the wise policy. Meanwhile the policy of looting is continued. Even the famous astronomical instruments have been carried off and divided between France and Germany. The Empress and her court have not yet returned to Peking, and it is thought they will not do so until the foreigners leave the city. They consider that their city has been desecrated, and their sacred places polluted, and they mourn, as only a people so conservative can mourn, over such calamities. It may be hoped that their humiliation will be a lesson to them, and that they will yet perceive that it was a grievous wickedness to take vengeance on innocent missionaries for the wrongs committed by foreign governments. The real pollution of their land is the Christian blood that sins it.

The land was polluted with blood (Ps. 106: 38).

Quitted the Ship

An interesting scene was witnessed at the Hamburg-American steamship pier at Hoboken, N. J., a few days ago. The Columbus was nearly ready to sail for Europe and a crowd of people were on deck bidding their friends farewell. Among the passengers were a lady and her husband. With them was a girl of about ten years old, carrying her doll and accompanied by a nursery-governess. The girl was weeping, and the couple, who were her father and stepmother, were trying to comfort her. Presently she ran through the crowd toward the gang-plank. She had some difficulty in making her way as she was embarrassed by carrying her big doll. She threw the doll down and pushed her way forward to the pier. There she addressed a stalwart policeman with: "Please, Mr. Policeman, don't let them take me with them. I don't want to go to Europe." It appeared that a ruse had been tried with the child, and when she came to the ship, she supposed that she had come to wish the travelers good-by. But once there, she learned that she was to accompany them. Then she resisted, and, though her father followed her to the pier, and begged her to return to the ship, she would not go. He could have carried her on board, but did not wish to use force, so she and her governess were left behind when the vessel sailed. We may hope that she will show similar firmness and readiness to sacrifice her treasures, if, when she grows up, temptations assail her and she is urged to do wrong.

Enter not into the path of the wicked and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it and pass away (Prov. 4: 14).

Is Mars Signalling?

A startling suggestion is made by Mr. Nikola Tesla, the famous electrician. He general interest and will doubtless stimulate further efforts to ascertain the truth. Pity it is that there is not a like anxiety to hear and understand the communication that undoubtedly did proceed from the heavens.

Much more shall not we escape if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven (Heb. 12: 25).

A Gallant Rescue

A large number of persons were gathered on the beach at Atlantic City, N. J., on January 20th, watching with breathless interest the efforts of the life-saving crew to reach a ship that had struck on the bar and was going down. The ship was the Coleman, from New Berne, N. C., bound for Atlantic City. She had met a heavy gale off Port May, and had sprung a leak. Eventually she became unmanageable, and drifted on the bar. The sea was very rough, and the attempt to reach the vessel was a hazardous undertaking. But the brave life-saving crew did not hesitate. They went out in their boat, battling with almost superhuman strength against wind set of saws and a bit, and were immediately arrested. The very next day a registered letter was received at the jail for the prisoner. He was brought down to receive it, but it was taken from him and opened. It was in cipher, but the detectives knew the key to the cipher and read the letter, which detailed a plan whereby four of his friends were to get him out of prison. The plan was allowed to mature, and all four were caught and imprisoned, so that the authorities have now in keeping six persons who have sacrificed their liberty in trying to save their friend. He goes to Sing Sing in spite of their efforts. Doubtless the original prisoner appreciates their devotion, although it did him no good. We may hope that during his term he will give ear to the preaching of the chaplain, who can tell him of a self-sacrifice infinitely greater than that was made for him, by which he may be saved from eternal punishment.

He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed (Isa. 53: 5).

BRIEF NOTES

Honolulu is about to have a vigorous temperance crusade, led by the W.C.T.U. and the Ministers' Union. Two representatives of the W.C.T.U., Miss Jessie Askernam and Miss Ada Murcutt, will lead the crusade.

The Archdeacon of Gibraltar, in a recent address, quotes the testimonies of such distinguished soldiers as Lord Napier, Roberts, Wolseley, and Kitchener, that "90 per cent. of the courts-martial and crime of the English army may be attributed to alcohol."

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been conducting successful evangelistic services at Elmwood Temple, Providence, R. I. A large number of young people were among the converts. It is expected that all the churches of the city will benefit through his visit.

A veteran missionary has been called to his reward. A cable dispatch from Constantinople announces the death of Dr. Elias Riggs, who has been in the service of the American Board for sixty-nine years. During that time he made a translation of the Bible into Turkish and Armenian. He was ninety years of age.

Forty years ago the first contribution was given by a Hawaiian church in Hilo ($1,000) for the building of the first Protestant church in Japan, and now missionary work is done in Hawaii by Japanese for Japanese!

The Methodists of Manila, in conference assembled, passed a resolution asking that ten young men be sent to the Philippines from America, to be appointed "two and two" to five different provinces, with the understanding they remain unmarried for four years, on a salary of $350 each.

Two new denominational representatives were recently added to the trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor: Rev. E. Humphries, New Bedford, Mass., of the Primitive Methodist Church, and Rev. Alfred Gandier, Halifax, of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

Dr. Russell H. Conwell, held a unique anniversary with which the Baptist Temple, Philadelphia, closed the year. At the baptismal service on December 31, he baptized his four thousandth candidate during his eighteen years' pastorate of that church.

Dr. D. K. Pearsons completed his benefactions for the Nineteenth Century, amounting to more than $2,500,000, by sending a check to Carleton College, Northfield, Minn. The last gift makes $50,000 which Dr. Pearsons has given to the Minnesota institution. Dr. Pearsons also gave $25,000 to Lake Forest University.

Four large landowners in London do not permit any building on their properties to be used as a saloon. These are the Shaftesbury Park, Queen's Park, Noel Park and Leigham Court Estates. Their aggregate area is more than three hundred acres, and they contain the residences of over fifty thousand persons.

A new Settlement work has been commenced in New York under Methodist auspices. The old Eleventh Street Church is now an Institutional Church, and a tenement house adjoining it is being used for the Settlement. It includes a gymnasium, a library and reading room, trade school and club rooms, ideal Sunday School and kindergarten quarters, and lodging rooms to be used in connection with the neighborhood work, besides quarters for the pastor.

M. PICHON THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR SEATED ON THE THRONE OF THE CHINESE EMPEROR has been in Colorado, making experiments at high altitudes with the object of perfecting a system for the development of the wireless transmission of energy. The favorable situation led Mr. Tesla to test other theories which he had thought out in his laboratory in New York, and among them the possibility of causing electrical discharges measuring one hundred feet from end to end. He succeeded in producing these discharges. Another test was a plan to detect feeble electric action, and in this, too, he was successful. A lightning-discharge ordinarily visible at three hundred miles was noted by his receiver at a distance of eleven hundred miles. This latter experiment led to the suggestion Mr. Tesla now makes. While conducting it, his receiver noted several feeble movements which were fully defined though weak. From their character he was convinced they did not proceed from our earth nor from the sun, and he thinks it possible that they came from the planet Mars. His own studies have led him to believe that it would be possible to construct an instrument which would produce electrical movements on that planet, so distinct that they could be recognized, if there are people there with receivers sufficiently sensitive, and if so, they may have learned how to send similar discharges. At any rate, until a better explanation of the phenomena that he observed in Colorado is given, Mr. Tesla clings to the belief that there are people on Mars trying to communicate with us. The idea is sufficiently thrilling to arouse and waves. It was evident that the vessel was sinking fast, and the men on board could be seen rushing hither and thither, trying to keep the vessel afloat till the lifeboat could come alongside. The people on the shore cheered the heroes in the boat, and admired their courage and perseverance. A great shout went up when they were seen to be nearing the vessel. At last they were alongside, and the crew of the vessel were dropping one by one into the boat. The return was still more perilous, for the boat was overcrowded, but by desperate efforts all the crew were brought safe to land. It was only just in time, for, looking out to sea, the ship was nowhere to be seen; she had sunk beneath the waves. What a good thing it would be if such anxiety was felt for the rescue of imperilled souls, and if they were as eager for their own salvation!

The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him . . . he will hear their cry and will save them (Ps. 145: 18, 19).

Six Prisoners for One

A series of efforts to liberate a prisoner in the jail of Queens County, N. Y., has involved six persons in trouble. The original prisoner was arrested for burglary. As he had already served one term for the crime, he was certain to get a heavy sentence; and as he was popular among his acquaintances, they made several plans to effect his escape. Shortly before his trial two men went to see him in jail. They were caught passing him a GENUINE sorrow, in which the whole world shared, was produced on January 22d by the news of the death of Victoria, Queen of Great Britain. From all parts of her vast empire there was one un-mixed expression of grief. Foreign nations, too, joined in the common sorrow, and testified to the reverence in which the Queen had been held. President McKinley was prompt in cabling a message of condolence to the bereaved family. The flags on the government buildings in Washington were lowered to half-mast, an example followed by all the intelligent Mayors of our chief cities. In New York the great bell of Trinity Church was tolled, and many of the leading business houses were decorated with draped flags and mourning emblems. It is doubtful whether there was any human being on the whole earth whose death would have caused sadness so world-wide. It is one of the most remarkable testimonies ever rendered to the value of character. It was not her power, nor her talents, nor her achievements that the world honored, but her sweet womanliness, her quick sympathy with suffering, and the high moral principles of her blameless life.

The end of her life was in keeping with the affectionate domesticity that had prevailed all through it. On January 18, the first definite report of her illness was made. Immediately, her family hurried to the homely mansion in the Isle of Wight where she was staying. Her youngest daughter, Beatrice, Princess of Battenberg, was already with her, as she had been, with few intervals, from earliest childhood. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, came down from London by special train. The Princess Christian followed. The Queen's other son, the Duke of Connaught, was in Germany, but he hurried to Osborne, and the Emperor William, who is the Queen's grandson, abruptly left the festivities then in progress in his capital, to accompany him. The only one of the Queen's surviving children absent was her eldest and best beloved daughter, the dowager Empress of Germany, who is, it is feared, herself in the valley of the shadow. As the princes and the princesses stepped ashore from the royal yacht the bystanders noted the traces of tears on their faces, and the worst inferences were drawn from the sorrow of those who were naturally most likely to know the exact truth. The physicians practically admitted that there was no hope. Her Majesty was suffering from "senile decay." The paralysis which had developed was secondary to the general weakness due to old age. The brief bulletins which were issued only too plainly told the people that the days of their beloved Queen were drawing to a close.

In all the churches on Sunday, earnest prayers were offered for her recovery, but there was never any real hope. The sorrow of all her people was genuine and intense as they read the ominous bulletins issued by the physicians. The information given out was meagre, but it was sufficient to arouse the worst fears. "How is Her Majesty?" a man asked of one of the Queen's Scotch attendants, and he answered: "Oh, mon, she is just a dear old woman deein'. All majesty has gone out of her." It was evident that all the resources of medical science could not long delay the inevitable end. But her wonderful constitution resisted the collapse. On Tuesday morning, January 22, about nine o'clock, she seemed to be sinking, and her children and grandchildren, assembled in the adjoining room, were summoned. When Emperor William arrived he rushed without taking off his overcoat to her bedside, and the first words he said were words of regret that his mother was unable to come. "Yes," murmured the Queen, "I wish 'Vicky' could be here," using a pet name of her eldest daughter. Once more the venerable Queen revived, but about four in the afternoon the Prince of Wales was again summoned, and half an hour later he was joined by the other member of the family. At five o'clock the Duchess of York arrived, and the Queen kissed her saying, "I am glad you have come." Bishop Davidson, the Queen's intimate friend, began to pray. The Queen slowly sank into unconsciousness. At a quarter past six the end was thought to have come. The Prince of Wales and several other walked out of the room. But the vitality of the Queen once more asserted itself.

For another fifteen minutes, with only the Prince of Wales and a few others present, the feeble spark was maintained. A half past six, with the Emperor William, the Prince of Wales and others absent, death actually came. The long life in which splendor and sorrow, sunshine and shadow had so marvelously mingled, had closed.

Out of doors, a half-mile away from the house, some forty newspaper correspondents were waiting for tidings. They heard the tinkle of a telephone bell, and in a few moments Inspector Frazer, one of the Queen's veteran attendants, stepped out between the lights, and said: "Gentlemen, the Queen died at 6:30." Having said this, the old officer quickly turned into the dark avenue, that none might see the emotion which shook his stalwart frame. Soon messengers were hurrying in all directions. One of them bore an affecting message to the Lord Mayor of London, who read it to the crowd assembled around his official residence, and then gave orders that the great bell of St. Paul's Cathedral should be tolled. This is done only at the death of some member of the royal family, or of the Lord Mayor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, or the Dean of St. Paul's. Soon the deep notes of the great bell were reverberating all over London, carrying the sad news to every home.

How numerous and varied are the events of those four score years in which the Queen was a prominent figure! To describe them adequately would require a volume. The utmost that is possible here is to mention briefly those incidents which show her character and the traits which have won for her the love of her own people and the reverence of the nations of the world.

It was a critical period in the history of the British monarchy when the future Queen was born. The Hanoverian dynasty had never succeeded in winning the cordial liking of the British people. Her grandfather, George III., had been less offensive than his predecessors, but he had alienated the people by his obstinacy and his arrogance. His eldest son, George V., was a libertine and a drunkard, and his second son, William IV., was coarse in manner and in speech. Neither of them had legitimate heirs, and the decent people of the land were disgusted by the scandals of the court and apprehensive of the influence of the example set by the royal family. It seemed possible that the family, and with it the monarchy, would eventually become extinct, when, in 1818, Edward, the third son of George III., at the age of fifty-one, married the widow daughter of the Duke of Saxe Coburg. To his great delight, a daughter was born to him. "Take care of her," he said, "for she will be queen of England." Eight months later, he was seized with pneumonia and died, leaving his child to be brought up by her mother. Happily, that lady had wise advisers who understood the importance of youthful training, and she had the good sense to be guided by them.

The child was carefully educated and was kept secluded from the debasing and corrupt influences of her uncle's court. The knowledge that she was heiress to the crown was prudently kept from her until she attained her twelfth year. When it was imparted, it seemed to impress her rather with the responsibilities it involved than with the splendor it promised. "I will be good," was her characteristic remark; and she kept her word. Now, that at the age of eighty-two, she has passed away, it is her goodness that her people chiefly remember. Her grace and dignity and tact are all praised, but it is her goodness, her kindness and purity of life that endeared her to her subjects. Her girlhood was a busy one. In addition to the ordinary accomplishments, she learned to speak fluently German, French and Italian, and had some acquaintance with Latin and Greek. She continued her studies until the time of her accession to the throne. It is a pretty scene that has been often described when the news of that momentous event was imparted to her. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the great officers of state went in the gray dawn of a summer morning, in 1837, to tell her that her uncle was dead and that she was queen of three kingdoms. She was asleep, but her mother, knowing the importance of the visitors, aroused her. She came to meet them, a slight, blushing girl of eighteen, clad in a plain white robe, her hair flowing over her shoulders and her feet in slippers. She received their homage with simple, unaffected grace, and begged the Archbishop to pray for the blessing of God on her reign.

Then followed, in quick succession, her first Council, her Coronation and her marriage. Several overtures for her hand were made by European royalties, but her girl love was given to her cousin, Prince Albert, the son of her mother's brother. It was from the beginning a union of the most tender affection. The prince at first was not popular with the British people and it was several years before he learned that his ideas of government, gained in a little German court, could not be imposed on the country of his adoption. There was friction between the Queen and her ministers when she attempted to follow her husband's advice; but the counsellors who had guided the Queen's mother, interposed with sage advice, and the Prince realized that the prerogatives of the crown for which he contended on his wife's behalf must be subject to the will of the people.

From that time forward the relations of the Queen with her ministers, no matter to which party they belonged, were harmonious. That she had her preferences there can be no doubt, but when, in obedience to the will of the people, the leaders of one party quitted office and the leaders of the opposing party were inducted, they found in Her Majesty the loyal support that had been given to their predecessors. Though she had the power to veto any measure that was passed by her Parliament, there was no single instance during her long reign in which she exercised that power. Yet she took an intelligent interest in all public affairs and exercised a potent influence on the policy of the country. This was notably seen in 1861, when in the trouble with this country over the seizure of the Confederate commissioners from the Trent the two nations drifted toward war. The letter to President Lincoln demanding the surrender of the commissioners, which Lord Palmerston had written, was submitted to the Queen, as all important dispatches were, and she refused to allow it to go until certain words that might be regarded as offensive were expunged and more courteous expressions substituted. There is little doubt that in that critical hour the Queen's wise courtesy did much to prevent a rupture between the two nations. A discreet silence as to the Queen's action in such matters was preserved, but current rumors credited her with other instances in which she restrained the arrogance of the minister of the day.

While the Queen carefully abstained from partisanship in politics, she took a decided stand in social life. The vigor with which she cleansed her court of moral lepers struck a large part of the highest ranks with dismay. She took care that the officers of her household were men of clean lives and that the ladies of the court had an unblemished record. The results of this higher standard of morality were felt from the beginning of her reign; new faces were seen at court, in no degree lower in the social scale than their predecessors, and many who had been favored for a score of years were frozen out by the simple, quiet iciness of virtuous dislike. The people rejoiced in the change, applauded her course, and gave their Queen such love and personal reverence as no monarch had received in Great Britain for a century.

The public events of that period are familiar to every reader of history. The Afghan war, the Irish famine, the first great Exhibition, the Crimean war, and the Indian mutiny made it an exciting epoch. Through it all the Queen identified herself with her people, sharing in their joy and sorrowing with them in time of affliction. They felt that she was one with them, and every public utterance from her tongue or pen served to show the tenderness of her heart and the sweet womanliness of her disposition. Thus it was that when the heavy affliction which cast a shadow over the remainder of her life fell upon her, the sympathy of the whole nation went out to her spontaneously with a fullness rarely witnessed.

Death of Prince Albert

It was a blow which a true woman must feel keenly. We know from her diary, published many years later, how passionately she loved her husband, how ardently she admired him. Nine children had blessed their union, and the youngest was little more than four years old when Prince Albert was stricken with gastric fever and died. The Queen was inconsolable. She withdrew from public notice and gave herself up to grief. After a year or two she resumed her attention to the business of the crown, but her people saw her no more except on rare occasions for more than twenty years. At the opening of Parliament or at the marriage of one of her children, she would appear, clad in the deepest mourning and with an aspect of settled melancholy; but the ceremony over, she hurried again into seclusion.

During that long period the Prince of Wales, who had married Princess Alexandra, daughter of the King of Denmark, endeavored as far as possible to fill his mother's place in the social functions of the court. Happily the Princess won the affections of the people from the time when she first came among them, and she loyally aided her husband in keeping alive the traditions of royalty. But the heart of the nation yearned for a sight of the Queen herself and at last she gradually emerged from her seclusion. The great pageant which, in 1887, showed her the deep abiding love and reverence in which she was held made a marked impression on her. It was the fiftieth anniversary of her accession to the crown, and all her realm united to make it memorable. Representatives of foreign royalties came to take part in the festivities, and such a demonstration took place as London had not seen since the coronation, nearly fifty years before. She was deeply touched by the enthusiastic devotion of the people, and in a graceful letter of thanks she expressed her emotion. In 1897 another celebration, scarcely less magnificent, marked the sixtieth year of her reign.

Those who saw her then, describe her as a hale old lady, with few traces of the girlish beauty of the young queen who rode through the same streets three score years before, to receive her crown, but still having the same charming smile, and sweet lovable manner and queenly dignity that had won the hearts of the earlier generation.

The remaining years of her life were saddened by the bereavements which must come to one who has passed the three-score years and ten. The friends of her youth passed away one after another. The ladies who had been her attendants, and whom she sincerely loved, were gone to the grave. Three of her own children—Princess Alice, the Duke of Albany, and the Duke of Edinburgh—were dead. Several of her grandchildren, including the elder son of the Prince of Wales, who, she expected, would eventually succeed her, had also been called away. The war in South Africa had been a grievous sorrow to her, bringing with it the disasters to British arms, and the loss of so many officers whom she knew and valued, and the death of so many brave soldiers. Those about her say how keenly she suffered before the tide of success turned in favor of her army, and how, even in the hour of victory, she mourned over the brave men who had fallen in winning it. She suffered much, but she suffered bravely, and to the last was keenly alive to all that affected her people for weal or woe. No wonder that they loved her and gave her the homage of their hearts! She was the personality in which their patriotism centred, and they felt that she was worthy of their reverence. Administrations came and went, changes took place in government and in society, but she remained high above all, dignified, sympathetic, graceful; every inch a queen. No wonder that they loved her, and that they mourn her death as a personal bereavement.

The New King Edward VII

THE theory of the British Constitution is that the throne is never vacant. By the death of the occupant the next heir becomes king. In this instance the next heir is the Queen's eldest son and second child, Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, who takes the title of Edward VII. He was born on November 9, 1841, and is consequently in his sixtieth year. On the day following his mother's death he traveled from Osborne to London to take possession of his right. The Privy Council, a large body comprising the chief nobles and gentlemen of the realm of all political parties, was summoned to meet him at St. James' Palace.

The ceremony was interesting and according to precedent. The King was first in a separate apartment from the Privy Counsellors. To the latter the Duke of Devonshire (Lord President of the Council) formally communicated the death of Queen Victoria and the succession to the throne of her son, the Prince of Wales. The royal dukes, with certain lords of the council, were then directed to repair to the King's presence to acquaint him with the terms of the Lord President's statement. The King returned with them and after taking the oath to maintain the constitution and govern according to the laws and customs of the country, said:

Your Royal Highnesses, my Lords and Gentle men: This is the most painful occasion on which shall ever be called upon to address you. My first and melancholy duty is to announce to you the death of my beloved mother, the Queen, and I know how deeply you and the whole nation, and I think I may say the whole world, sympathize with me in the irreparable loss we have all sustained.

I need hardly say that my constant endeavor will be to always walk in her footsteps in undertaking the heavy load which now devolves upon me. I am fully determined to be a Constitutional sovereign in the strictest sense of the word, and so long as there is breath in my body to work for the good and amelioration of my people.

I have resolved to be known by the name of Edward, which has been borne by six of my ancestors. In doing so I do not undervalue the name of Albert, which I inherit from my ever-to-be-lamented great and wise father, who, by universal consent is I think, deservedly known by the name of Albert the Good, and I desire that his name should stand alone.

In conclusion, I trust to Parliament and the nation to support me in the arduous duties which now devolve upon me by inheritance and to which I am determined to devote my whole strength during the remainder of my life.

The King spoke without notes and evidently under deep emotion. Those who were near him say that he was looking very pale, and his usually cheerful, happy countenance wore a look of deep sadness. At the beginning of his address his voice broke more than once, but by a strong effort he controlled himself and finished his speech in a clear, strong voice. He was, however, unequal to meeting his Parliament, which had been called together to take the oath of allegiance to him which was accordingly taken in his absence. On the following morning January 24, the heralds, clad in the quaint suits of olden time, proclaimed him King at St. James' Palace, with ancient forms. They then proceeded to the city, halting at the site of Temple Bar, which is the city boundary. There they were met by the city marshal, who demanded, according to ancient custom, "Who goes there?" The heralds stated their business and asked permission to enter the city. They then proceeded to the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor's official residence, where the proclamation was read again. It concluded with the words: "Beseeching God, by whom all kings and queens do reign, to bless the royal prince, Edward VII. with long and happy years to reign over us."

THE GLORIES OF VICTORIA'S REIGN

EDITORIAL BY
T. DE WITT TALMAGE

AN empire on which the sun never sets mourns its beloved and revered sovereign, Victoria. All the nations of the earth rise up and call her memory blessed. No constitutional ruler in history ever held the affections of her own subjects, and admiration of other great empires, as the late Queen of Great Britain and Empress of India. No other single reign in the history of the British monarchy has been so long, so pure, so illustrious, or marked by such marvelous progress. The empire over which she ruled has, without interruption, progressed steadily in wealth and power, while its political and moral development, continuing through two full generations of her reign, marks her as the greatest of all the sovereigns of Europe. The glorious achievements of her long rule, and solidifying the government of the British empire are due to the pure personal character, exalted piety, and deep devotion to the interests of all her subjects.

No other sovereign ever held the loyalty and affection of all their peoples like Victoria. Future historians will portray the vast measurement of her influence, and the lasting obligations which the world owes to this departed monarch.

Ten Prime Ministers, some of them the most brilliant intellects the world has ever known, served her, and by wise counsels, great caution, and firm adherence to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, she gained such an exact knowledge of all transpiring under her sceptre as to make her a tower of strength to the nation. Besides, her far-reaching influence by ties of consanguinity with the ruling families of Germany and Russia cannot be estimated fully, an influence always benign, and more than once contributing to the maintenance of European peace. It was due to the Queen's view of her constitutional position, and her able executive tact, that the monarchical theory became fitted to the fact of republicanism without detracting dignity on one side, or self-government on the other, and the harmonious relations have been such that the creation of parties hostile to the throne were never dreamed of in the empire.

The coronation oath which Victoria took on her ascending the throne on June 28, 1838, which reads as follows: "Will you maintain to the utmost of your power the laws of God and the Protestant Reformed religion?" to which she gave answer by laying her hand on the holy Gospels, "These I will perform and keep, so help me God," was never once violated, but preserved most sacredly. This ideal of womanly purity, and virtue, and sincere devotion to him who is "King of Kings," so steadily upheld before all the world, has left an impression upon the whole social economy that ages never will obliterate. Her royal court, and every one of her courtiers, were also held to the same lofty ideal, in marked contrast to the stained and polluted character of some other sovereigns and their servants.

The reign of Victoria will ever be remembered for its unequalled enrichment of literature and art, and its most signal triumphs of science and industry.

The spread of education, the extension of civil and religious liberty, and general amelioration of social conditions by which it has been distinguished, all unite to mark off "the Victorian Era" as one of the most memorable epochs in the history of the world. There is no more clear and unimpeachable testimony to God's word, that "righteousness exalteth a nation," than this, that a sovereign can rule a world-wide empire, yet maintain so pure a life, and personal consecration, and devotion to high ideals, and by her influence wield a potent power for the moral development of her realm. What can be said of no other potentate of earth may be truly said of Victoria. None ever suffered from her indiscretions, nor did she ever need to shield herself from severe censures by "the divinity that doth hedge" a monarch, by reason of intrigues, ambitions, and unworthy aims.

Let us hope and pray that King Edward VII. may continue to exercise the same conspicuous virtues and excellent graces as his departed mother, and to receive and hold for long years to come the loving acclaims of all his loyal subjects.

But we rejoice that there is one throne at which all sovereigns must pay homage that never will be vacated—a throne of eternal duration—and whose sovereign is the King of Kings, and at whose feet we humbly plead for the bereaved and stricken members of the royal family who mourn the departed Queen. May heavenly consolations rest upon them all, and the same illustrious virtues, devotion to truth and righteousness, and fidelity to God's law and Christ's Kingdom, mark their future which so gloriously characterized the reign of Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Empress of India.

AROUND THE WINTER FIRE

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE PATCHWORK QUILT

I've seen of silken splendor,
With glinting threads of gold,
I've seen the priceless marvels,
Once hung in halls of old,
Where fair hands wrought the lily,
And brave hands held the lance,
And stately lords and ladies
Stepped through the courtly dance.

I've looked on rarer fabrics,
The wonders of the loom,
That caught the flowers of summer,
And captive held their bloom;
But not their wreathing beauty,
Though fit for queens to wear,
Can with one household treasure,
That's all my own, compare.

It has no golden value,
The simple patchwork spread—
Its squares in homely fashion
Set in with green and red:
But in those faded pieces
For me are shining bright,
Ah! many a summer morning,
And many a winter night.

The dewy breath of clover,
The leaping light of flame,
Like spells my heart come over,
As one by one I name
These bits of old-time dresses—
Chintz, cambric, calico—
That looked so fresh and dainty
On my darlings long ago.

This violet was mother's;
I seem to see her face,
That ever like a sunrise
Lit up the shadiest place.
This buff belonged to Susan;
That scarlet spot was mine;
And Fannie wore this pearly white,
Where purple pansies shine.

I turn my patchwork over,
And I feel the lilac fragrance,
And the snowfall on the eaves.
Of all my heart's possessions
I think it least could spare
The quilt we children pieced at home,
When mother, dear, was there.

DOLLARS AND CENTS

WHEN Strephon puts on his Sunday best, and goes to court Doris, so everyday a matter as money never enters either head. She receives him, a gallant figure, courteous and debonair, his port as brave as her eyes as that of some knight of the Middle Ages. Doris herself, in her pretty daintiness of attire, her silk waist, her shining eyes, her mass of golden hair, is as captivating as a princess in a fairy tale, and she carries herself as regally. Whatever her station, she has been born in the purple, if an American girl. Farmer's daughter, merchant's, mechanic's, or scholar's child, she is well educated, well mannered, and independent. If her people are rich, she has had money in plenty; if poor, she has earned it. As a typewriter, a teacher, an artist, a singer in the church choir, as saleswoman, she has been her own mistress, and, if wealthy, she has had her allowance for her fortune, and thus independent. Sometimes, unfortunately, marriage changes all this.

Once married, and settled in a home, however unostentatious, the question of the exchequer soon rears its formidable head, and is neither to be evaded nor ignored. To carry on the simplest household, money is an absolutely necessary factor in the machinery. Though lovers, could they be brought from the clouds to ain terra firma, would scout the notion that money might one day be a persistent edge to ruin their happiness, the little bit within the lute, fatal to the music; that thousands of husbands and wives, in indignant moments, would confess that they've devoted to that one cause all the heart-burnings they have ever had. A man says, "Andly and sincerely, Whatever I earn belongs to my wife." She has only to ask, and she dislikes to ask, and if her asking is preceded by reluctant or hesitating or surprised asking, she is covered with humiliation as with a cloak. Men seldom understand the multiform personal requirements of women. The purse-bearer holds too heavy a balance of authority. No wife should be forced into the position of a licensed mendicant in the marriage relation. No wife can enjoy this, though she may seem to acquiesce.

If the home is to be a type of heaven in its sweetness and rest, the two who are responsible for it, and who carry it on, should arrive at an intelligent agreement about its financial management very early in the day. If they have been building on an unsubstantial foundation they will do well to start anew at any period in their common career.

With an eye to the style of living preferred, husband and wife may easily estimate the cost of various items in the annual bill of expense. Shelter, fuel, clothing, food, are the primitive wants. The education of children, the social ramifications of the family, a margin for charity and for travel, come later. The wife, if she defray any portion of the regular and acknowledged expenses of the household, servants' wages, schoolbills, etc., and the accounts of the grocer and the butcher, should have her allowance, paid to her at stated intervals, for the purpose. Beyond this, and in accordance with the family means, she should have something for her individual expenses, her private purse. If possible, her separate bank account, even if very small, should be part of the domestic scheme.

Men constantly complain of or assert the business incompetence of women. Yet a woman may be treated like a child all her life, and if by her husband's illness or death, without previous training or preparation, she will meet the occasion, and prove herself mistress of its exigencies. The wife who never had any money in her control, who perhaps bought what she chose and sent the bills to her husband, or did without desired conveniences rather than face his criticism, will, when thrown upon her own resources, show a wonderful adaptability. She will not launch out as a spendthrift, nor be foolishly wasteful, neither will she be miserly.

Women are born administrators and economists, and given the opportunity, they manifest good judgment and common sense. Obligated by an unwise custom to accept the role of juvenility in their married lives, to explain their purchases and justify them, and to ask for what should be theirs by right, they have no chance to reveal their hidden ability.

I once knew a wife who saved bit by bit, in silver coins and coppers, out of her household expenses, enough money to buy a gold chain for her good man's birthday present. Perhaps she might have made a better choice, but she paid for it in the rain of small pieces which it had taken her a year to accumulate, and—her husband refused the gift, and compelled her to take it back and have the money refunded. An extreme instance of this of Mr. Scrooge in married life.

Thrift is a virtue which should be cultivated, if not indigenous. A French woman stands aghast at the lack of it in an American, but the French woman has had the advantage of being always a recognized partner in the domestic firm.

Looking forward to old age, or to the dowry of her daughters, and the establishment in life of her sons, she has been in the confidence of her husband and has assisted him to build up their united fortune. American wives are often pitifully ignorant of their husband's affairs. The husband, honestly anxious to shield the wife from every care, keeps his problems in his office, and has not the courage in periods of stress and wild weather to let her know the imperative need of retrenchment. No home can ever be perfect where on either hand there are reserves. Entire confidence is an essential of success in home making. Doris and Strephon, should life be granted them to reach their golden wedding, will be lovers still if they have proceeded on this rule. And surely, if a man trust his wife with his most intimate and sacred secrets, with his good name, with his children's care and upbringing, he may well afford to be open, and to bestow upon her regularly a requisite portion of the home income.

The Saloon

No evil that menaces society compares to the deadly saloon. On every street corner in the city we find it, warmed,

"CHLOE CAME IN WITH CAKES AND TEA"

lighted, and alluring to men whose homes are close, crowded and ill-kept. In rural neighborhoods it stands at the cross-ways, a temptation to boys and young men. Women do well to fight it, but they should do so by opening coffee-rooms, by sustaining settlements, and by educating childhood to hate strong drink, not by breaking into it illegally and destroying its property, as was lately done by a well-meaning but mistakenly zealous reformer in the West. The Christian Settlement and the Christian Mission are the most potential foes of the saloon, except indeed the Christian church and the Christian periodical.

Learn to Say No

One of the important things for us to learn in childhood, and never to forget in later life, is the power of saying No to ourselves on occasion. In the hour of the weakened faith, in the hour of the tempting lure, in the hour of anger, of doubt, of irritability, let us, in God's strength, say No to ourselves, to the low mood, to the unworthy thought.

Again to Discuss the Maid

I SAID Grandmother Penelope, "remember Southern cooking before the war—the fried chicken, the waffles and honey, the muffins and light bread, the beaten biscuits, the ham and greens, never did food have so fine a flavor. A Southern table was loaded with a great variety, and plenty ruled, and outdoors in the kitchen, Aunt Hannah, or Aunt Melissa ruled a brood of little darkeys, and concocted such dishes as we dream of now. The Southern mistress was a notable cook, too. She knew to a fraction how many eggs, how much sugar, how much butter, and how much of everything went into every loaf of cake, and of bread. She was no idler, this capable Southern housewife, and she has shown since the war how to turn her administrative talent into other excellent channels."

And grandmother rounded the heel of her stocking.

"Well," sighed pretty little Mrs. Mattie Lincoln, "I wish I had been young when you were. I've forgotten how good cooking tastes. We have sour bread, soggy cakes, overdone meat and leathery puddings at our house, and Mark and I have dyspepsia. Such maids as our Kates, and Maries, and Biddies, and Carries are, would drive a philosopher to despair. I can cook on a chafing-dish, but Mark does not appreciate my messes as he calls them, so now I've given up in despair."

"Chloe to the rescue!" gaily cried Mrs. Sophia Praxom. "I import my maids from the Sunny South; they do have a natural knack at cooking. The one trouble I have with my successive Chloes is this: they are birds of passage, light-hearted, cheery, laughing at everything; they only stay awhile and then, with their wages in their pocket, go back to the mother, the husband, or the child they left behind. But other Chloes come, and the colored servant, when good, is a real treasure. And, when she is indifferent, she is easily dropped."

"I observe," remarked the minister's wife, "that there are a great many more colored people in Northern neighborhoods than there used to be. They are thronging in, as the Irish and Germans slip into other occupations, into trades and factories, to take the vacant places. I, for one, like the easy-going black folks. They are not very thorough, but they are like children, and can be trained; they need a firm and gentle hand over them, and a mistress who knows her own business."

"For my part," answered Lulu Hart, as though she had received a challenge, "I shall not marry until I am competent to take proper care of my home. Isn't that the wise plan, grandmother?"

And grandmother nodded approval—as Chloe came in with tea and cakes.

"That a young woman should boast of her incapacity for housekeeping and home-making amazes me," said Miss Rebekah Crabtree, gazing severely in the direction of Mrs. Lincoln. "If I were a wife, I would not neglect a thing which could make my husband contented."

Mrs. Lincoln laughed in an unruffled way. "Oh! Miss Crabtree, it all depends on the point of view. Mark and I jog along somehow, and we don't quite starve. But I mean to find out whether Chloe's sister wouldn't like to come and live with me. Have you a sister, Chloe?" she inquired, sweetly. "Yas'm," said Chloe.

Scandal

Scandal is the repetition of evil. It may or may not be bearing false witness. It is always the setting free upon the air of miasmatic germs to poison society. Stop the tale of scandal by the deaf ear and the sealed lips.

Gems from the World's Great Pulpits

Living Thoughts from the Recent Sermons of Eminent Preachers of Many Denominations

THE KIND OF PREACHING THAT IS NEEDED

DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, NEW YORK

IT is a good thing for the preacher before he addresses his audience to put his sermon before God, and go through it on his knees. If this plan is followed, there will be some points which may have appeared to him to be the best, which will be left out, and there will be other thoughts given to him which never entered his mind, far more searching than anything he could have worked out for himself. It is a good plan to preach to your people only that truth which grips your own soul, and this, as a rule, is made plain to the preacher when on his knees before God he presents his sermon for His approval or disapproval. There is a demand to-day for the sermon that can reach the hearts of men, awaken them to their responsibility in the world, and convince them of the fact that they need Christ both for earth and for heaven. Unless the great army which is moving slowly but surely away from the Church is soon arrested, there will be a crisis upon us which it may not be easy to meet.

OBSTACLES TO THE CHURCH'S PROGRESS

REV. CORTLAND MYERS, D.D., BROOKLYN

THE church is blessed with an abundance of machinery and the power of the Divine Spirit is still in the earth; but there are obstructions on the tracks—landslides and wrecks which must be removed. They effectually prevent all progress, notwithstanding the marvelous possibilities in the engine. We are on the eve of a great revival, and a tide of evangelization such as the world has never seen is waiting to sweep over America and the world. But there must first be a revival of righteousness and fidelity on the part of professed followers of the Man of Calvary. Morality has too often been divorced from religion, but it has ever been an unauthorized and unholy proceeding. A revival of the Ten Commandments and Sermon on the Mount and the Golden Rule will be introductory to the salvation of thousands and hundreds of thousands in these coming days. This is also true of the onward march of evangelization around the world. It is the insurmountable hindrance to the saving of the heathen nations when they witness such a representation of Christianity in the nations which carry the banner into their territory only to loot and steal and deceive and murder. All this seems like mockery. God speed the day when the Christian world shall live the divine principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. First things first. Men of God, how tremendous your responsibility.

HOW CHRIST COMES TO MEN

DR. JOSEPH PARKER, LONDON

HAVE you read the method of God in the Bible, that he hardly ever comes in the same form to any two men? The chariots of God are twenty thousand, and who shall say in what chariot he shall ride forth to-morrow or to-night? We ought to be little children; we should say to one another, Who can tell how the dear Lord will come to this soul or to that soul? And we should often say to one another that a book of remembrance might be written, How did the Lord come to you? How did Jesus come? Why, variously: (Mark 16: 12) "After that he appeared in another form to two of them."

But, my soul, see that in some way thou dost behold thy Lord; thy way, thine own way. Thou art peculiar, eccentric, individual, speculative, rational, logical, ecclesiastical, all in thine own way. See Christ, and do not upbraid me because I have not seen him quite in the same way; and I ought not to upbraid you because you have not seen him just when I did. I saw him in the garden, the East, a living glory, a living pearl; and you saw him in the West, with the sun dying on his couch of gold. So the evening and the morning are one day. But do not chide one another, and bicker with one another, and publish comments and remarks upon one another, sometimes doubting whether the Congregationalists, or the Anglicans, or the Presbyterians, or the Methodists can be quite right. Certainly, they are all right, and for want of knowing that to what have we come? The fact is that the first disciples, if they had been as clever as we are, would have had seven different denominations founded upon the seven different ways of appearing, with four missionary societies, or seven missionary societies, and all manner of hedges, and ditches, and lines of demarcation. There is a cleverness that approaches blasphemy. He was seen of James, then of all the Apostles. He goes on from the individual to the social number, to the hundred, and to the all. The same Lord; an infinite variety of forms.

FORTITUDE IN CHRISTIAN LIFE AND SERVICE

PASTOR W. J. MOSIER, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

TO "walk and not faint" is more difficult and more blessed than to run. It means walking by faith and not by sight. It means, "Blessed are they who have not seen and yet have believed." It means, knowing and doing God's will without visions or dreams or wonderful supernatural manifestations. It does not, however, mean uncertainty, but assurance as to God's will. "My sheep hear my voice," says the Good Shepherd. Spiritual guidance may be as certain as the fixed science of mathematics. It means faithfulness in duty when there are no great works visible as the result. The stable and God-ordained plodder works on year after year "steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that his labor is not in vain in the Lord." High Christian life is perseverance in walk and work without miraculous manifestations. It is a mistake to suppose that the Gospel must be accompanied by miracles in order to win its way in the world. All the miracles on record do not convince the majority of men, nor would they be convinced if they could witness them all in a day.

To "walk and not faint" is Godlike. In the same context we read, "Hast thou not known, hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary?" It is a great comfort to know that the same word which designates God's endurance and perseverance and strength is used to describe the blessing that comes to his people who wait on him: "They shall walk and not faint."

OBEDIENCE TO LAW THE BASIS OF LIBERTY

REV. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, D.D., BROOKLYN

BECOMING a Christian is simply to obey the laws of Christ and God. Liberty is obedience to law. Slavery is disobedience to existing laws. Disobey the law of fire, and the hand is burned until it is helpless. Disobey the law of light, and the optic nerve is ruined, and the man is a slave of blindness. Disobey the law of digestion and sleep, and the brain goes down in ruins, and the man becomes a helpless invalid, or perishes. Obey the law of speech and the lips are touched with eloquence; obey the law of color, and the brush is touched with beauty; obey the law of steel, and the hand hath skill over tools. The measure of greatness in any animal is the number of laws it has mastered and obeyed. And the pathway of obedience to these laws of Christ and God is the pathway of happiness and newness of life. It is sin that narrows the life. It is disobedience that cabins men and confines them; it is loyalty to God's laws that breaks down the walls, pushes back the horizon, and makes the soul a citizen of the universe.

IS CHRISTIANITY DETERIORATING?

DR. D. J. BURRELL, NEW YORK

AROUND the whole horizon of the century the record of progress has been uninterrupted save at a single point: it is alleged that the quality of Christianity has been steadily deteriorating. Here is the fly in the ointment. Here is the only interruption in the exultant paean. At this point the joyous chronicler strikes the minor note. Is it true? I venture the opinion that there never was a time when the level of Christian character was higher than to-day. We listen to all that is said about the imperfections of church members, and then dare to assert that there never was a time when the individual Christian approximated more nearly to the definition of Alex. Pope: "A Christian is the highest style of man." . . . Let every follower of Christ refrain from criticizing the Church and see that he himself is a faithful follower of Christ. The need of all needs is for individual reform; for less of criticism and more of personal consecration. Let everyone sweep his own door-step clean. And let us be of good courage. God will take care of his Church. He has founded it upon a rock, and has declared that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Things are, indeed, not as they should be. The ideal will never be reached until the heavens part asunder and Christ comes to reign upon the earth. But things are vastly better than they used to be. Our world, at every revolution, comes further into the light. The King's chariot wheels cannot be hindered. He cometh to reign! The hands on his dial never turn back.

CHRIST THE GREAT NEED OF THE TIMES

DR. H. P. DEWEY, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

MEN are now placing a higher valuation upon manhood. Do we need cleaner streets, better municipal facilities? Perhaps so, but far more better men. Do we need better equipments in the churches? It may be so, but far more do we need better Christians. The novice upon the violin returns from the concert, having heard the skillful playing of the master, and feels as if he himself had discoursed the sweet strains, because they are a realization to him of the music he has tried to bring forth, but could only do so in feeble and broken notes. And shall we not believe that he who is the fulfillment of all that is highest in the aspirations and ambitions of human life, the perfect man who is in very truth the realization of ourselves at their best, will ever fascinate and allure men, and call to himself a constantly enlarging number of royal followers. To himself, I say. For we cannot devote ourselves to Christian sentiment, we cannot carol and anthem Christian principles. We cannot grow jubilant over the resurrection theme, or praise the idea of mortality, we must do homage to the definite person who, laying his life down took it again, and in the shadows of the tomb on that first Sunday morning, spoke the familiar word in the accents of the old love, "Mary!" and got the response, "Rabboni, Master." And surely, as we find ourselves following and honoring the personal Christ, and as we try to imitate his spirit and obey his commands, we shall take on his mind and be filled with his feelings and have his consciousness transferred to ourselves, and in that appropriation of him we must of necessity gain his sense of God, feel the influence on us of the divine, which so encompassed and thrilled him.

TAKING NO THOUGHT FOR THE MORROW

DR. A. M. FAIRBAIRN, OXFORD

THOUGHTFULNESS is a virtue, thoughtlessness is a vice. A careless man has no merit in the eye of men, and deserves none in the eye of God. A careful man is a man who faces life as one who knows his duty and his responsibility in relation to it. And Jesus cannot mean to insist upon the vice of thoughtlessness. The man who does not take thought as to what he ought to do is heartless. He who goes through life thinking never of others, thinking only of himself, expecting duty to be done to him, never feeling he ought to do the duty, is the very man that Jesus meant to censure. "Take no thought" means "Be not distracted, divided, drawn in two ways at once." And he says nothing about the attitude of to-day, it is "to-morrow." Now man's cares, so far as they are evil, spring from to-morrow rather than from to-day. The number of battles men fight in imagination is infinite: the number of battles they fight in reality is comparatively small. Distracting anxiety, devouring care, exercised about what may be, but is not, is the misery of life, the weakening of courage. The true care is taking thought for to-day, not for to-morrow, so obeying God that he gives you what you need, and you leave to him the function and grace of life rather than take all to yourself.

ANXIETY FOR THE SALVATION OF SOULS

DR. F. M. GOODCHILD, NEW YORK

A YOUNG man came to me some time ago concerned for the salvation of a brother who had died. He was in great distress of mind. He said: "Oh, I would give up my own hope of heaven, if that would save him." So Paul said here on behalf of his people. So Moses once said as he pleaded with God for Israel. So a greater than Moses or Paul, or any one else, not only said but did, when he endured the woes of sin in our place, "and redeemed us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us." And just here is the serious lack of the Church to-day. We do not feel for souls as we should. We do not weep over the lost our fathers did. We do not understand Paul's passionate frenzy and the Saviour's blood sweat as they contemplated the frightful ravages sin was making in the souls of those who they loved. We have forgotten how Mart Luther was bent almost double as he pleaded with men to turn to God and live. We have forgotten how Thomas Chalmers foamed the mouth as he urged men to flee from the wrath to come. We have forgotten how John Summerfield and Robert McCheyne and Edward Payson were so eaten up of zeal for God and men that they worked themselves into early graves. May God give us a new sense of the soul's value. May God bring us anew the awfulness of sin. May God bring us to what the Bible calls "travail for souls." Then people will be born unto God. For the Lord says through Isaiah: "As soon as Zion travailed she brought forth children."

QUALIFICATIONS FOR SOUL-WINNING

REV. S. M'BRIDE, D.D., BROOKLYN, N. Y.

"HE that is wise winneth souls." Winneth souls is a divine art. How to do it not learned in the schools. Our colleges and theological seminaries may turn out great scholars and eloquent preachers and eminent theologians, but they cannot impart the heavenly accomplishment of winning men to Christ. The man who does that must be taught of God.

To win souls we must go where they are. We cannot catch fish without going to the lake or stream where they are. Jesus said, "Go. We build fine churches, and say to sinners, Come, but they do not."

Again, if we would win them we must love their lives. The carnally-minded Christianian almost inseparable barrier in the way of sinners coming to God. Actions are loud voiced. "Your life is so bad I cannot help what you say." Then we must be kind, tender, and above all spirit-filled and prayerful.

THE DIVINE PERSONALITY IN CHRISTIANITY

DR. CHARLES E. GOODELL, BROOKLYN

IT is the glory of Christianity that it was founded upon a theory or a creed, but upon a personality. Christianity is not a code, it is a life; it is not a duty, it is a love. Love is the measure of life, therefore the supreme test of discipleship is "Lovest thou me?" Love fulfils the law and the prophet and infinitely more. It makes the Christian life a holy and absorbing passion.

What a splendid love the men who kneed Christ in the flesh gave to him, and they who took up their work were not a whit behind them in devotion. No sacrifice was too great, no martyrdom too terrible. They wore the shirts of flame in triumph, and looked lions out of countenance. The same spirit is seen to-day. Scholarly men and noble women die in China with their converts, "not accepting deliverance." Do you ask why this marvelous Love begets love. We shall never be able in our deepest devotion to approximate his love to us.

INDISPENSABLE CONDITION OF SUCCESS IN PRAYER

REV. G. E. TALMAGE, SCHENECTADY, N. Y.

YOUR prayer must be sincere. I have known men to pray, and I have prayed myself, when I was at the same time hoping that the prayer would not be granted. Such prayers are not answered. If you are praying for instance, to be delivered from the power of drink, and are holding the glass nearer and nearer to your lips while you pray, I can tell you, without looking, that you will drain it when you are through the prayer. If, however, you are dashing it to the ground while you pray there is hope that you will not fill another glass. Brethren, there are some of you who do not dare to pray for salvation, because you are afraid that you will find it. And so long as you are afraid, you will not find it. When I hear a man say that he is not able to join the church, because he is afraid that he will not be able to live up to the rules, I know just what he means. He means that he does not wish to live up to the rules, and he does not wish salvation for fear that he will live up to them. Aye, there is the rub! And men remain silent, and the prayer is unuttered, and salvation slips by.

FINEST Y. M. C. A.
Building in the World

THE NAVAL BRANCH
IN BROOKLYN ERECTED BY HELEN MILLER GOULD

SECRETARY FRANK L. SMITH IN HIS OFFICE

WHAT will undoubtedly be the finest Young Men's Christian Association building in the world, is now being erected in Brooklyn by Miss Helen Gould as a memorial to her parents. The structure will cost $300,000, and will be a Naval branch of the Y. M. C. A. It is within three blocks of the Navy Yard. The present membership of this Naval Y. M. C. A. numbers over five hundred. It was organized less than two years ago at 167 Sands street, with forty-five members. Work among the men of the naval service was at once begun. Clean beds, a good cuisine and well furnished parlors, supplied with everything for the comfort of the men, were the attractions offered. The result was a steadily increasing patronage, until at last the old quarters had to be torn down to make way for the new and more commodious building. The basement of this new building will contain bowling alleys, plunge baths, a well equipped gymnasium, and nearly five hundred lockers. On the ground floor will be the secretary's offices, a reading room and parlor, and a large restaurant. The upper floors will have two hundred dormitories. These rooms will all be fully furnished by the Woman's Auxiliary, and anyone, on payment of fifty dollars, which will be expended for the furnishing of a bedroom, can have the privilege of naming any one of them as the donor may desire. The top floor will have an auditorium where entertainments will be held at frequent intervals. A special feature of this magnificent new building will be the roof-garden. The entire roof will be made into an open-air theatre, where the donor and his friends may enjoy the cool breezes while listening to splendid programmes of amusement.

The branch has been accomplishing wonders in leading a great many sailors and marines to acknowledge God's love and power. It acts as a central pivot, where "Jack" may turn for advice and help of whatever character he should desire. An average of $600 is received monthly by Secretary Frank L. Smith, which members forward to him from all parts of the world, to be applied as they direct; sometimes he is to send the money to their mothers, wives or relatives; again, it is to deposit it in a savings institution.

The Naval Branch does not stay at home, so to speak. It makes itself felt in the Navy Yard, at the Hospital, in the Marine Barracks, and on board visiting ships. The latter carry away packages of magazines and similar literature, to beguile hours at sea or on remote stations. While lying at the Yard, sick boys are visited, and commissions executed for those who are disabled.

The success of the Brooklyn Naval Branch has been so pronounced that the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Associations have recently organized other branches at Naval Stations at Guam, Ladrones Islands; Cavite, Asenal, Philippine Islands; San Juan, Porto Rico; and at Havana, Cuba. The privileges are open to all members at these stations, as well as at some other twenty associations in our seaport cities. Branches have been formed, too, on board a number of Uncle Sam's ships.

Temperance branches have also been organized on many ships, and each member signs a pledge to wholly abstain from all intoxicating liquors, as a beverage, during the period of his service in the navy. No fee is charged for membership in this league, and each member is given a neat silver-oxidized pin, which is worn by him constantly. For each year of faithful membership, and upholding of the pledge, handsome insignia will be conferred. The Navy Department at Washington will further recognize this movement by adding to the present enlistment blank a column headed "Total Abstinence," to be marked "Yes" or "No" each quarter, by the commanding officer of the ship, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," writes a member of the Naval Branch, "is to be found at all the Naval Branches, and on most of the ships of the Navy, and is one of the papers most sought after, by the officers and the men. It is their newspaper, magazine and religious book, all in one."

The Tower of Babel

The manuscript of the account of the condition of the Tower of Babel, as written by the Greek traveler Harpocration, has been recently discovered; and M. De Mily gave an interesting account of its contents at a session of the Paris Academy of Inscriptions. The following summary is from The Independent: "The tower was renovated in the days of Nebuchadnezzar, in the sixth century B.C., and this king reports in the inscription he caused to be made, that the town had been erected forty-two generations before his time. Thanks to the report of Harpocration we now know that as late as the fourth Christian century this temple was still a place of worship, although it ceased to be such some time before 380. The tower was ninety-four kilometers from Ctesiphon, south of Babylon. It consisted of a very wide substructure, seventy-five feet high, the sides being one hundred and eighty-four metres. In the middle stood a four-cornered tower, built of six sections, one upon the other, each twenty-eight feet high, and upon the top section was a small tower, only fifteen feet high. These seven stories together made the

MADE SACRIFICES FOR INDIA

Stories of Generous Help Cheerfully
Rendered for the Famine Waifs...

THE stories that reach us from week to week, telling of the self-sacrifice displayed by various members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family, in their desire to help the famine orphans of India, are interesting as well as gratifying.

MISS HELEN PECK

The story of little three-year old Helen Peck, of Corona, N. Y., for instance, is pathetic when considered as an incident, and inspiring as an example to her elders.

One evening, recently, the Union Church in Corona was crowded to the doors by villagers who had come to hear the narrative of a returned missionary from India—one who with his own eyes had seen the famine in all its horrible aspects. He told of the gaunt faces and sunken eyes of the famine waifs, and of how every penny would count toward feeding, housing and educating the unfortunate ones; but before he could finish his plea, little Helen Peck slipped over her mother out into the street, ran to the communion table, which was above her head, tossed her little envelope up into the collection plate, and then toddled back to her pew with a happy smile. At home, after the service, her father found her seated on the floor, having put out bright pennies, one by one, from her iron bank and putting them with great care into the little barrel for Indian money, whispering as she did so, "Feed 'em, feed 'em, feed 'em." As she put the last of her fifty-two pennies she shed a sigh and said, "Now I guess I've fed 'em all." Helen has now an adopted brother among the India famine boys, whose name is Sahila Bunaji Peck, and who is being educated under the direction of Mr. Hume, at Ahmednagar.

While the famine is over, there is still much suffering in India to need the help of many such young and enthusiastic workers as Miss Jennie Wease, a student at the Normal University at Ada, Ohio.

MISS JENNIE WEASE

As a student missionary volunteer, she devoted her holiday weeks to collecting money for India's orphans. At the sacrifice of the social pleasures she might have enjoyed, she went among church people of all denominations, and non-church-goers as well, and collected $200, which she sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for orphan work.

Another worker who has proven the rule of "the will and the way," is Mrs. J. E. McLean, of Friend, Neb. She desired to send money for the orphans, but had not a dollar of her own to spare for the purpose. The household burden of a family of six devolved upon her. She mastered the situation by putting up flower seeds in packages and selling them—ten packages for ten cents. With the proceeds of her little business she is now supporting twelve famine orphans. Among these is a special protégé of Mrs. McLean's daughter, named Kerria, but known in the missionary school as George Washington, so named because of his unflinching truthfulness.

Finally, there is Mrs. E. S. Ormsby, chairman of the Ladies' Missionary Society in Emmetsburg, Ia., who, through her unwearying efforts, induced Iowans to contribute corn for the starving of India, and sent a carload, containing 36,000 bushels of the precious food, to New York. The corn was carried to India on the relief steamship Quito, and its distribution undoubtedly preserved many sufferers who otherwise would have perished.

An Aged Servant of God

Appointment to preach his semi-centennial sermon is an honor rarely conferred on a minister. Yet, upon invitation of the Newark Conference of the M. E. Church, Rev. R. Bowen Lockwood, of Thiells, Rockland Co., is to address that body at its next session in the spring of the present year.

REV. R. B. LOCKWOOD

Mr. Lockwood is seventy-six years old, and he has had an unbroken service of fifty years as preacher and pastor. In the quiet little parsonage at Thiells, he and his wife, rich in good works, if poor in this world's goods, watch the shadows lengthen as their years decline, with hearts of trust and cheer, for the Master whom they have served is faithful and forgetteth not his own.

A CASE OF EXTRAVAGANCE.

YOU never cut off three-quarters of a new cake of soap and throw it away! Yet you pay twice the price of Ivory Soap for a cake of "tinted" toilet soap less than half as large. Your little cake of toilet soap costs you four times the price of Ivory, for it lasts only half as long and costs twice as much. No money can buy purer or better soap than Ivory. If it came in dainty paper, all scented and colored, you would pay fifteen cents for a very small cake of it.

HOW HE FOUND CHRIST

The Story of the Late Bishop William Xavier Ninde's Change of Heart

IT may be doubted if in all the millions of the great Methodist communion throughout the world, there was any man more universally and tenderly loved than William Xavier Ninde. If he had an enemy in the world it surely was not known. He was, by common consent, very generally known as "The St. John," among Methodist Bishops. Surely now that the great sunrise has come to him, and God has taken him to himself, after a life so beautiful and useful, Christians everywhere will be comforted and strengthened to know, in the words from his own lips, the causes which led to his giving himself in his youth to Christ.

On November 7th, 1900, less than two months before his translation, Bishop Ninde wrote me a letter from the Hotel St. George, in Brooklyn, in response to a letter from me, from which I quote:

"Dear Dr. Banks: I have been much run down in health since receiving your letter in September, a part of the time confined to my bed. Am now very much better though still below my usual grade in strength. This will explain my tardy reply, which may be too late to be of service to you. My childhood and early will to that of a new Master. This involved the surrender of all cherished and ambitious plans of life, and the consent to become a humble preacher of the Gospel. After many inward struggles, involving the sharpest contention with my predilections, I yielded the point at once and forever. Then came the contest with my pride, in making a public committal. As I look back over the long period of half a century, I find it very difficult to understand the extreme hesitation I felt in making a public confession of my change of views and new attitude toward Christ. There were moments when my reluctance seemed insurmountable. But happily the constraint became irresistible, and I was led at length to a full and earnest decision. It was in April of 1850 that I made this firm resolve which proved the turning point of my life. My sins did not burden me, though I acknowledged myself a grievous sinner. I never doubted the willingness of God in Christ to forgive me. My burden was lifted when my will was brought into harmony with God's.

"It was early in the week when I made this final determination. There was great religious apathy at the time even in the churches, but I resolved that on the next Sabbath I would make a public confession of my faith. An inner voice at once suggested: 'Why not seize the first opportunity?' I was now in a mood to obey this sacred voice. Now, the first time in years, I found my place in the Thursday night prayer-meeting. There were three or four men including the pastor and myself, and perhaps seven or eight women. But those who were present were truly saints whose hearts were deeply imbued with a sincere and profound spirituality. I had prayed most earnestly for days that I might have strength to keep my pledge, yet, to my dismay, I saw the pastor rise with the evident purpose of closing the meeting. I felt it the fateful moment for me. I caught hold of the back of the seat in front of me, rose to my feet, and, with a trembling but assured voice, said: 'I want to be a Christian, and I ask you to pray for me.' With my clearer views of the Christian life, I do not doubt that I already was a Christian; that from the moment when I surrendered my will and accepted the crucified Christ as my Master and Lord, I was brought into saving fellowship with him, but the simple confession severed the last tie that bound me to the past, and brought me into new and active relationship with the church of the living God, which has made my whole life a Psalm of grateful rejoicing.

"I have extended this sketch much more than I intended. Perhaps you can cut out of it what will answer your purpose." But as all this was written in Bishop Ninde's own handwriting, so soon before his going away, I have felt that I could not do a more generous thing than share the letter with you in his own words. I doubt not there are thousands of young men in the land who stand just where young Ninde stood, before he went to that Thursday night prayer meeting and confessed Christ. I pray God that his testimony may lead many of them to follow his blessed example!

Libraries in the South

Mr. J. M. Good, of Thaxton, Va., writes concerning a new and interesting work which is being inaugurated in his section, he says:

I am starting a religious and literary association, with branches in various country neighborhoods. The organization to be new, on somewhat similar lines to those of the Young Men's Christian Association as it exists in cities—our plan includes men and women, however. We will have a library, or rather, book and magazine exchange, in which members will contribute as much as possible to each other's profit and pleasure. In our large Southern towns there are few public libraries; in the country there are none. Taking this into consideration, with the fact that we have preaching but once or twice a month, it will be seen that our spiritual and intellectual opportunities are not what they might be. Our wealthy men do not seem to take the interest in building up libraries that such citizens in the North display, and establishing enterprise will be uphill work for a time. But I believe it the best thing possible for our rural neighborhoods. Religious services, and such entertainment as we can secure in the way of lectures, is a part of our plan.

WILLIAM XAVIER NINDE

youth were spent amid surroundings very favorable to the development of true piety, but unfortunately, when sixteen years of age I removed, in the pursuit of a livelihood, to a place where I formed associations which were chilling to my religious nature. I became for the time wayward, indifferent to religious services, and decidedly unbelieving. It was a merciful Providence which restored me, after some months, to my former home among cherished kindred, where I conformed to the habits of the family without hesitation, and yet with a degree of reluctance in resuming attendance upon the services of the church. Although a lost sinner I was happily lost in the house.

"My residence at this time was in the village Lowville, in Northern New York. The pastor of the Methodist Church was the Rev. Lorenzo B. Stebbins, a recent graduate of the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Connecticut. He was a man of scholarly tastes and habits, whom I learned to respect and esteem. I do not remember that he spoke to me personally upon the state of my soul, but he preached a short series of sermons upon the evidences of Christianity which greatly impressed me. My mind was forced into a channel of inquiry. Day after day, while employed in my work as a printer, the rational proofs of the Christian faith engaged my absorbed attention, until at length every doubt was removed, and I confessed myself a full and firm believer in the Bible as a trustworthy revelation from God.

"Up to this time I had kept my change of views a close secret. No one, so far as I knew, suspected my mental agitation with its happy result. I found it now impossible to rest in right thinking. The Holy Spirit pressed me to act up to the light I had received. There was no escape from the conviction that I must embrace Christ as my personal Saviour and confess him before men.

"Two difficulties now confronted me. In the first place, I must yield my own

PUFFED UP.

But She Got Over It

It sometimes takes nerve to quit a habit, even after it is plain that the habit is ruining the health.

A little woman who was sick from poisoning (and there are thousands like her) writes: "I had become almost a coffee addict, drinking it at each meal, then afterward so nervous and weak that I would drink coffee. I was a great sufferer with stomach and heart trouble."

"Everything I ate distressed me. I would be great puffs beneath my eyes and hands and feet were terribly swollen, reduced to 108 pounds and was really dying."

"A gentleman talked seriously to husband and myself about my giving up coffee using Postum Food Coffee. He convinced me, from his own and other experiences, probably coffee was the cause of my trouble so we tried Postum, but at first it seemed flat and tasteless that I was almost disgusted. However, I looked at the directions on the package and found I had not boiled it long enough, so I followed the directions exactly and had a clear, rich beverage, with a strong ring of good coffee and very delicious taste."

"I began to sleep better and was not so nervous, my stomach and heart trouble slowly disappeared, and, of course, as getting well I stuck to Postum, and that easy, because it tasted so good. Now a year's using I can truly say I never felt better in my life, have no trouble whatever with stomach, sleep well, eat well, and weigh pounds. My nervous headaches have appeared. I feel like telling everybody it is ill to try leaving off coffee and use Postum Food Coffee, for it will surely work a cure. Mrs. Ella Kitching, Salinas, Cal.

Newsboy, Schoolboy and Preacher

SOME portion of the fund for the famine sufferers in India, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was instrumental in raising, came from what might be called a church in a stable, in St. Louis. This impromptu church was organized by a boy named Earl Jameson, eleven years old. He was converted two years ago, when his sister was baptized at Maplewood Church. The idea of holding week-day services occurred to Earl, and he asked permission of a neighbor to allow him to use his barn evenings. The neighbor consented, and the services have been continued month after month, and not only his playmates, but a number of grown people have been among his hearers. Earl conducts all the exercises, reading a lesson from the Scriptures, offering prayer and addressing his audience. He is old for his years, and conducts the meetings with seriousness and dignity. Collections have generally been taken up for the poor in his neighborhood, but he became interested in the India famine some time ago, and suggested that the pennies and nickels gathered at a series of meetings should be appropriated for the relief of the sufferers. As many as fifty women and children have gathered in the barn, and Earl now devotes most of his weekly evenings to them. He does not feel that he ought to conduct services on Sunday, as he is not an ordained clergyman. He attends one of the St. Louis public schools; but, in addition to this, earns money by selling newspapers.

The American Church in Berlin

ON behalf of the American Church, I desire to thank all those who have thus generously responded to the appeal. I am sure that there are many among your readers who will follow their example and further so worthy a cause. The good words and wishes that have accompanied the gifts have been most cheering. I wish you could print them all, but I must content myself with a selection. Rev. Dr. Theo. L. Cuyler writes: "In my opinion, that new American Church in Berlin is one of the most important lighthouses to be kept burning on the continent of Europe. Its influence will be felt over Germany as a standing and splendid witness for evangelical religion. Our 2,000 American students need it also."

A young lady writes: "Will you kindly accept the enclosed one dollar to help a little. I do not wish to deny myself the pleasure of a share in the work because my contribution must be small. Among the pleasantest memories, I count the services at the American Church, Berlin."

Another writes: "The unattractive hall where the services of the American Church were held filled me with rage and grief, and I send the enclosed to help build a church worthy of such services." Yet another: "I shall never forget the service in that dingy, gloomy place, for, in spite of the outside dreariness, there was power there to lift up and cheer the innermost recesses of my soul, and I do hope with all my heart, that your efforts will soon be crowned with success."

All gifts should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and will be acknowledged by myself by mail.

ANECDOTES OF QUEEN VICTORIA

Incidents that Showed her Goodness of Heart and her Great Love of her People

ONE of the Queen's first acts after accession was to show herself generous and above prejudice in recognition of merit. It was Lord Mayor's Day, and the girl-queen, in brilliant array of satin and ermine, had come to dine with the Chief Magistrate of London, at Guildhall, where there was a grave and goodly company to do her honor, and a dainty new chair of state, in which she would sit before a table that Aladdin himself might have called into existence. After addresses of city magnates were read and replied to, she laid across the shoulders of Sheriff Moses Montefiori a Christian sword, and bade him rise up—the first of his race to be knighted by an English sovereign.

"Risk No Life But My Own"
After the memorable drive in 1842, when the second attempt was made on the Queen's life, a crowd of troubled officials and friends, among whom was Sir Robert Peel, gathered about the Queen, discussing the event. Turning to Lady Bloomfield, she said: "You were surprised, Georgy, at not driving with me to-day. But the fact is, that as Albert and I were returning from church yesterday, a man presented a pistol at the carriage window. It flashed in the pan, and we were so taken by surprise that he had time to escape. I knew what was hanging over me to-day, and was determined not to risk any life but my own."

Her Plea for a Soldier's Life
Soon after her accession to the throne, the Duke of Wellington brought for her signature a court-martial death sentence. Weeping, she asked: "Have you nothing to say in behalf of this man?" "Nothing." "O, Your Grace, think again!" "He is a bad soldier—has deserted three times," responded the Iron Duke, "but I have heard he was a good fellow in civil life." "O, thank you!" cried the girl-queen, and wrote: "Pardoned" on the terrible parchment. When she had exercised this prerogative several times in a similar way, Parliament, ostensibly "to relieve Her Majesty of a painful duty," arranged that a royal commission should sign death warrants.

The Princess Royal—The Kaiser's Childhood
"Only a girl," said the people, when the Princess Royal was born; but "Vicky," as her mother familiarly called her, who was to be Empress of Prussia, was heartily welcomed by her parents. "I wish Vicky could be here," murmured the dying Queen to her grandson, Kaiser William. There is a letter, written by Victoria, then a young grandmother, on a visit to her daughter in Germany, which says: "Dear little William (the present German Emperor) came to me, as he does every morning. He is such a little love, with beautiful, soft white skin, Fritz's eyes, Vicky's mouth." On "Vicky's" wedding day her mother wrote: "Dear Vicky gave me a brooch, containing her hair, and clasping me in her arms, said, 'I hope to be worthy to be your child.'"

Birth of the Prince of Wales
The guns and bells of England thundered and rang themselves hoarse when the Prince of Wales was born. His mother wrote her uncle Leopold: "I wonder very much whom our little boy will be like. You will understand how fervent are my prayers to see him resemble his father in every respect." The Prussian king was one of the baby's godfathers, when he was christened in St. George's Chapel, where, says the chronicler of the day, "His Royal Highness behaved with princely decorum." The letter which his mother wrote him, when he reached his majority, in its tenderness and wisdom, belongs to the classics of mother-love.

Religious Instruction of the Queen's Children
These words, contained in a letter of instructions to the Princess Royal's governess, deserve a place of honor in every nursery and school-room: "I am quite clear that she should be taught to have great reverence for God and for religion, but that she should have the feeling of devotion and love which our Heavenly Father encourages his earthly children to have for him, and not one of fear and trembling; and that thoughts of death should not be presented in an alarming and forbidding view; and that she should be made to know as yet no difference in creeds."

Personal Ministries to the Poor
At Windsor, Osborne and Balmoral (the latest-named especially) the Queen went about among the peasants like any "laid's wife," in an unpretending, neighborly way. Her journal describing one of those rounds of visits to cottages, says: "Before we went into any, we met a woman who was very poor and eighty-eight years old. I gave her a warm petticoat and the tears rolled down her old cheeks, and she shook my hand and prayed God to bless me. I went into a small cabin of old Kitty Kears, who is eighty-six years old, quite erect, and who welcomed us with a great air of dignity. She sat down and spun. I gave her also a warm petticoat. She said: 'May the Lord ever attend you and yours.'"

Little Princess, "Victoria, the Good"
Victoria, the Good, might be said to have laid claim on that title when a very little girl. When the Regency Bill was before Parliament Baroness Lehzen, her dear old governess, laid a genealogical table before the princess. "I see I am nearer the throne than I supposed," said the child solemnly. "There is much splendor, but much responsibility." Holding up her right hand, she said: "I will be good. I understand now why you have made me learn so many tiresome things. I will be good."

FOOD IN MEXICO.
American Food, Grape-Nuts, Replace Native Food.
A gentleman from the City of Mexico, Pa T. Gadsden, writes that himself and some other members of his family could not live comfortably on the ordinary food in Mexico and after using the native food for some months, finally got into a run down and exhausted condition.
He says: "An American feels most acute the need in mind and body of some of the invigorating food he has been raised on in the States. Several months ago when I was particularly feeling the need of some change of food, I noticed Grape-Nuts in the window of one of the large grocery stores here, and remembering how, in the States, some little nieces and nephews had grown fat and healthy on it, almost exclusively, I bought two packages, to see if it succeeded as well with grown up people.
"From that day to this it has never been absent from our table. With us, the exhaustion and enervation caused by this climate and the miserable diet, has entirely disappeared, and we are all in most excellent health, vigor, and spirits."

CHEERING WORDS FROM FOREIGN FIELDS

Missionary Hume Again at the Helm
BOMBAY, Dec. 29, 1900.

My dear Dr. Klopsch:—The last mail brought me your kind letter, without date, enclosing two checks—one for $75 for the orphans of '97, and one for $10 in Mrs. Hume's name. Please accept our hearty thanks for them. I shall soon write you fully in regard to the orphans.

I have only been back here a few days, and am not yet in position to speak of matters as they stand. The Interdenominational Committee is to have a meeting next month. I shall then resume my place on your committee, as my brother has resigned in my favor. It is a great pleasure to think that I have been you, and have come to know you and our associates in your office.

Yours very sincerely,

E. S. HUME.

How the Famine Waifs of '97 Progress

KALMARI, Dec. 24, 1900.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of your favor containing check for $75 for the famine orphans of '97. I beg to thank you heartily on their behalf for the same, and to state that they are all doing well and are improving rapidly every way. One cannot but remark a great contrast between them and the famine waifs we have taken on the recent famine. They act much more civilized every way. Many of them have learned to show their gratitude in various ways. At the recent Government Examination (that is, at the annual examination held by a Government Educational Inspector, who comes around visiting all the aided schools, and examining them to see the progress made from year to year by the scholars), he expressed himself as well pleased at the progress most of these pupils had made in their studies. Yours very sincerely,

W. O. BALLANTINE.

Pandita Ramabai's Deep Gratitude

MUKTI-KEDGON, POONA DISTRICT, INDIA, Dec. 28, 1900.

Dear Friend:—Just a few lines to thank you for your generous gift toward the Lord's work here. God bless and reward you. I am glad to tell you that the Lord has given me two girls by this time. Please pray for me for the work. May this new year bring heavenly joy to you. I am very glad and thankful that the India Famine Fund has reached such an extent. Thank you very much for the most interesting papers you sent me. The Lord bless and make you very happy. Sincerely yours the Lord's service,

RAMABAI.

Armenian Children Help India's Orphans

COORFA, TURKEY, Dec. 29, 1900.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I am sending you, through our Constantinople treasurer, another contribution from the Oorfa people for the India Famine Orphans, making, together with the amount sent about four weeks ago, £27 90-100 Turkish or $122.76. One of the touching gifts during the early days of our distress was £2 sent by some native Christians of India! We all remember how promptly and generously THE CHRISTIAN HERALD telegraphed relief to us, and that the first offer from America for help in orphan support was again from the same source. So we are very happy in using you as our channel for conveying our little gift to poor India's orphans. The head-teacher of our girls' high school, who was with me in Oorfa before the disturbance, and is now joyfully again working with us here, entirely in her own language and at her own suggestion, gives you the story of how the money has been obtained.

Very sincerely yours,
CORINNA SHATTUCK.

(Miss Hosanna H. Sirkissian, Secretary of the Y.W.C.E., of Oorfa (to whose letter Miss Shattuck refers), writes telling of the generous self-denial of the people there, who though poor, gave liberally to the cause of India. The Y.W.C.E., the Y.M. Society, the Sunday School, and the children in the orphanages, all denied themselves in order to send money to India for the support of famine waifs. Five hundred orphanage children gave one cent each, denying themselves meat for one day for that purpose. Even the Gregorians subscribed enough to support two India orphans. One widow gave 84 times a thank-offering; an old ragged woman, after hearing the story of India, gave twenty-five cents; a Turkish woman, too, gave a small gift out of pity. Enough was collected to support five orphans at least.)

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

LIGHT ON : : : : BIBLE TOPICS*

Help for Christian Students in the New Instalment of a Great Work

UR readers have learned from previous articles the general character and style of the valuable Dictionary of the Bible now in course of publication by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons of New York. The third volume, just issued, fully sustains the high character of its predecessors. It covers subjects from Kir to Pleiades, and thus contains matter of intense interest to all Bible students, especially to busy ministers. Dr. Hastings, the editor-in-chief, has evidently kept the need of this latter class continually in mind and, as in the former volumes, has taken care in dealing with difficult subjects to make his explanations clear to men of small erudition. The articles are designed to give in concise form the latest information attained by Biblical scholars, and to present every fact which may serve to shed light on the sacred text. In matters of dispute, especially those relating to the authorship and date of the various books, the arguments on both sides are frankly stated, and the opinions of the writers are given with modesty and an absence of dogmatism very refreshing in a theological work. The general character of this volume is conservative, while taking account of the results of the Higher Criticism, many of which are necessarily adopted by intelligent students. Extreme views find no favor with the writers, and though probably such a work as this would have shocked our grandfathers, there are few educated ministers of our day who will find in it anything they are unable to endorse.

The article which marks the attitude of the editors toward the Higher Critics more clearly than any other is that on "The Language of the Old Testament." Every student knows what elaborate arguments have been built on the appearance of one or two words in some one of the Scripture books. An effort has been made to show that a book containing such words could not have been written before a certain date. The effect of the arguments has been generally to bring the dates of the books much nearer to our own time than we formerly believed. Professor Margoliouth, who writes this article, shows how it is possible that the words which are supposed to fix the date of the books in which they occur, may have been picked up from travelers even before they came into common use, or may have been inserted in an early work by editors of a much later date when they sought to make the work more intelligible to their contemporaries. In short, that the presence of a modern word in a book does not necessarily prove that the book belongs to the period when that particular word came into use. He is, however, of opinion that the books, as they have come down to us, contain no verse of an earlier period than 1100 B. C., or of a later period than 100 B. C. Probably the opinion expressed by Professor Margoliouth that will excite the fiercest opposition is the one that Deuteronomy belongs to the same period as Jeremiah and Ezekiel. He holds also that traces of the Aramaic, the language in use during the eighth century before Christ, and earlier as well as later, are to be found in all the Old Testament books. Even this, however, may have been the work of copyists, who seem to have felt themselves at liberty to substitute modern words in cases where the more ancient word was not in common use.

Many other important topics fall within the scope of this third volume. The article on miracles, by D. J. H. Bernard, contains an exhaustive examination of the objections of the sceptics. Dr. Bernard's defence would perhaps not be accepted by a sceptic, but it would certainly supply the advocates of the orthodox view with arguments that would be satisfactory to the average thinker. Another valuable article is that on marriage, by Prof. Paterson. We are glad to see that he shows clearly and emphatically that the Bible does not forbid marriage with a deceased wife's sister, a question which has involved gross injustice in other countries through misunderstanding one passage of the Mosaic law. His remarks on Paul's attitude toward marriage clear away much of the difficulty which has disturbed many minds. A deeply interesting article is that on Paul, by Prof. G. G. Findlay. It contains a fine analysis of character, and shows how the apostle's experience before his conversion as revealed by incidental allusions in the Epistles prepared him for the acceptance of the revelation on the road to Damascus. But probably the articles that will be found most useful to the student are those on the books of the Bible which are within the scope of this volume. Those on Leviticus and the Gospel of Mark are especially valuable.

Only one volume remains to complete this work, which ought to find its way into the library of every minister and every advanced Bible student. It is a library in itself, and by giving a list of authorities on all important subjects, is a guide to students who wish to prosecute their studies of any particular topic.

RIISING SUN Stove Polish.

Made perfect by 40 years' experience—its shine is brightest, comes quickest—lasts longest—never burns red or cakes on iron. ALSO IN PASTE FORM—"SUN PASTE STOVE POLISH."

Mr. C. M. Scott, of 1849 Dorchester Avenue, Boston, Mass., who is a railroad freight clerk, is a well known and prominent Republican, and a representative of his ward on the Republican City Committee.

Mr. Scott has been a sufferer from a severe form of general debility and nervousness. He is now in robust health, and attributes this change to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. In reply to questions asked in a recent interview, Mr. Scott said:

"About two years ago I suffered from general debility. I doubt if there was anybody more utterly miserable than I was. I had no life or energy, and was as depressed mentally as I was worn out physically. It was not at all unusual for me to go to sleep over my work. My blood was thin and watery, but the worst of it all was the dreadful, wearying nervousness at night. When I retired at 10 o'clock instead of going to sleep I would toss and turn till well on into the morning, and when I awoke it was without any feeling of being refreshed or rested. I lost so much flesh that I got down to 122 pounds in weight, and I had no desire for food."

"Last January a friend urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I had previously tried many different kinds of remedies and had consulted three physicians but the little relief they gave was very brief, so I was completely discouraged. My friend, however, insisted and I tried the medicine."

"By the time the second box was begun there was such evident improvement that I continued taking them till the ninth box, when I felt that I was entirely cured. I now weigh 158 pounds. There is no sign of nervousness; I rest well and feel strong, and am able to enjoy life once more. Mrs. Scott was feeling a little run down a few weeks ago, but she immediately began taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and she is experiencing the same beneficial results that I did."

Signed C. M. SCOTT.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, are sold by all dealers or will be sent post paid on receipt of price, 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50, (they are never sold in bulk or by the 100), by addressing Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

CONFESSING CHRIST*

...The Terms of Discipleship and What Duties They Involve

ONTRASTS more striking than were seen in the career of any man in history are furnished by the character of Jesus of Nazareth. One of them is seen in the passage associated with the topic. While he was so meek and humble as to assign the religious leaders of the time, here puts forward claims more stringent than any monarch ever laid upon his subjects. None, he said, were worthy to be his followers, who did not make loyalty to him the ruling principle of their lives; and this not a nominal, theoretical loyalty, but an allegiance paramount over all relations, superior to the love of a child for its parent, a husband for his wife. A man could not be an accepted follower of him unless he was ready to leave his father and his mother at Christ's bidding, and to turn a deaf ear to even his wife's pleading, if she wanted him to do something inconsistent with his duty as a follower of Christ. Those who came around the Master in those days must have wondered at this lowly Carpenter making such demands, and wondered still more when he told them that their loyalty to him could be tested in the very way he described. His appearance, he said, would produce a dividing line that would compel recognition. A man's foes would be they of his own household. So it proved. In those days, as in later times, the alternative was forced upon many, either to adore Christ, or to leave home and all that was dear, and become a social outcast. Practically, he told them that they had better consider that ordeal before attaching themselves to him, and to hold proof if they realized that they were unable to bear it.

There was also to be an intrepidity in his followers of a very decided kind. Secret discipleship would not be accepted. His followers were not prepared to publicly avow themselves, they were not fit for his service. The penalty of avowal might be so terrible that people would shrink from it and prefer to be regarded as orthodox Jews while loving him in their hearts; but such homage was rejected. The consequence of such shrinking would be a denial of them; he would acknowledge only such to be his as identified themselves openly with him, and bore the penalty whatsoever it might be. There must have been a majesty about him which it is difficult for us to understand, otherwise none would have become his followers on those terms. To us, accustomed as we are to think of him as the Son of God, the terms are perfectly reasonable, but those poor peasants must have had strong faith to accept them. And how nobly true to their allegiance they were! History records how men and women gave up home and family and friends, and even life itself, rather than give up their allegiance to Christ. The men of that time were amazed to see humble men and gentle women choose death rather than desertion of Christ. When a word would have saved them from torture and death, they would not speak it; but went heroically to the stake or the stake declaring their fidelity to their Lord. How is it now with us? How many there are now when no such penalties attach to an avowal of Christ. We are kept from making it by fear of ridicule or of the loss of social position!

Yet the conditions of discipleship have been changed. There are still the same demands and the same consequences awaiting them. Those who acknowledge Christ as their Lord before men, he will acknowledge before his Father in heaven; those who deny him before men, he will deny before his Father. Nor is it a mere verbal confession, only, that is required, though that cannot be omitted—it is a confession of the life. As he goes on to say, those who desire to be counted among his followers must take up their cross. They must not only bear the trials that discipleship brings upon them, but they must voluntarily assume the burdens that discipleship involves. There must be a renunciation of pleasures and indulgences inconsistent with Christian principle, and there must be a sympathy and helpfulness of others that is often a heavy burden. Who has not wondered as he has seen a city clergyman going from one tenement house to another, helping and comforting the poor, sitting in stifling rear rooms ministering to the sick, when he might have been in a grand mansion or drinking in new life in the air of a park! Who does not wonder at seeing a promising young man go out to Africa or China, where he may die a cruel death from violence or fever, and can hope for no reward, even if he escape death! The secret is that which sustained the early Christians. These modern martyrs are losing their lives, losing all that the world regards as making life worth living; they do it voluntarily because it is a glory to bear the cross. To them, though they seek no reward, the promise is given: "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

Anniversary of a Pastorate

The seventh anniversary of the installation of Rev. Dr. Easton as pastor of the Easton Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., was held on Jan. 24th. At the close of an interesting service of praise, addresses were delivered by several members on the marked success attending the pastor's ministrations. Mrs. R. E. Harvey presented, on behalf of the Ladies' Aid, a magnificent bouquet of roses and carnations, and Mrs. Mary E. Ireland (an author-ess well known), read an original poem, in which she emphasized the love and esteem in which Dr. Easton is held by his people.

Thus he spake—that grand apostle—
Holy martyr, prince of men—
He, the Lord's own "chosen vessel,"
Mighty still with tongue or pen.

CHORUS: Are we "ready to be offered?"
Should the time be near at hand?
Can we say that we are "ready,"
"Ready" for our Lord's command?

"An eternal weight of glory
And a crown of righteousness,
Wait for me, and not me only,
Wait for all the Judge shall bless."
Can we say that we are "ready,"
That we always "watch and pray"
That we "love our Lord's appearing,"
And are "waiting" for that day.

We may never win our thousands
Like that grand old hero, Paul,
Have the care of all the churches,
And be first among them all;
But we can be true disciples,
Filling well some lowly place.
We can fight the "good fight" bravely,
And "with patience, run the race."

in White Bronze Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

448 Pages and Over 1400 Recipes This Cook Book may be said to be a revision of the famous "White House Cook Book" (the regular price of which is $2.50), a condensed volume in complete practical form, but containing all the most important recipes of the latter, and more easily within reach of the masses in point of price. It was written by that world-famous chef, Hugo Ziemann, steward of the White House, assisted by the well-known expert, Mrs. F. L. Gillette. Every page was, in fact, written with special reference to utility—to the practical everyday requirements of the household. It embodies several original and commendable features, among which may be mentioned the convenient classification and arrangement of topics; the simplified method of explanation in preparing an article in the order of manipulation, thereby enabling the most inexperienced to clearly comprehend it. A complete index, alphabetically arranged, enables any recipe to be found easily and quickly.

Readers are invited to forward new questions which they believe would be suitable for discussion in this department.

These Questions Will be Answered Mar. 13

1. What is the duty of a church towards some of its members who habitually, constantly, and for a long time neglect their church duties, but who do not live in open sin?
2. What is the cause or explanation of an "open winter," scientifically stated?
3. What is the difference between "piety" and "religion"?
4. Does Eph. 5:4 mean that humor, wit and innocent mirth are incompatible with a Christian life, or does the passage refer exclusively to humor of a degraded or reprehensible sort?
5. Should Christians who have lost relatives or friends, who were undoubtedly saved, clothe themselves in black, seeing that the color is emblematic of gloom and despair, or should purple or some other color be adopted?

Questions of the Week

1. Is it a genuine test of a young man's patriotism to ask him to volunteer for military service at a time when the country is not menaced by any serious danger?

No. In all times and in all lands, the call to arms has been invested with a glamour as unreal as it is misleading; and led on by this imaginary glory, young men often enlist for military service, thinking that in no other way can they so well show their love for their country. In times of actual war, many men undoubtedly enlist from motives of pure patriotism; while many others volunteer without thinking or knowing why, led on solely by a desire for change and excitement. Modern warfare is simply a business, and to enlist for military service in time of peace is only another way of earning a livelihood. The truly patriotic man is he who has an abiding love for his country, and who, while deploring war as one of the greatest of existing curses, is yet ready and willing to battle for his country's defense, when resort shall at last have been made to war. But he will fight without malice toward his foes, and will endure the hardships of war willingly and without complaint, because he believes his cause to be just. In time of peace, he is ever ready to assist in all things that make for the welfare and advancement of his country; he watches with zealous care over her schools and charitable institutions, and never fails to use his influence for the furtherance of any cause which tends toward the keeping of his nation in the foremost ranks of human progress. This, and this only, is the sure and safe means of showing true patriotism.

A. L. VERMILYAN.

Not unless the regulation number in the army has been diminished, and difficulty is experienced to secure volunteers for military service; because we have been made plainly to believe the standing army life an exceedingly dangerous one to the morals. Neither the young man nor his parents could choose life in the regular army as being helpful financially, mentally or morally. The influences are bad in every way. It takes a man of strong character and a Christian to endure the temptations there entered, so many idle hours being the principal cause of danger toward drunkenness, gambling, etc. Consequently, unless the need is real, true patriotism would keep a young man out of military service.

MRS. S. S. MCBRIDE.

Answers have also been received from the following: L. B. Russell, W. Whitworth, F.

A. Brown, C. P. Lounsbury, R. T. Edwards, William G. Dixon, J. B. McGregor, Charles H. Harrison, M. H. Lufburrow, S. H. Baldwin, J. G. Osborne, J. L. McGhee, J. T. Sharrard.

2. How is the distinction to be made between the "false shepherd and the true" in modern church life? What is the test to apply in such a case, where both men may be equally talented?

The test that Christ gave whereby we may know the false prophets, and the true as well, is practical for every age. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The Scriptures specify the characteristics of the "false shepherd" in part as follows: They serve only themselves, mind earthly things, feign piety and sanctity, fear persecution, respecters of persons, deceitful workers, prophesy false peace, wrest the Scriptures, deny the Lord that bought them, preferring questions of vain philosophy to truths of Scripture, etc. The "true shepherd" preaches the Word that is able to save and build up; he watches for souls, seeks the wandering, reclaims in love those repelled by uncharitableness, is willing to make personal sacrifice, sympathetic, faithful in warning and reproving, tender in treatment of young and burdened Christians, persevering if by any means he may save souls. Thus it is grace, producing character, and not talents, that distinguishes the true from the false.

R. W. THOMPSON.

Christ was born about four years before our era began. It would be hard to correct the error now, especially as it is more widely used than any other system. The Jewish era is supposed to begin with the creation of the world, which is fixed at about 3,760-1-4 years B. C. This system of chronology has been in use by the Jews since the fifteenth century. The Roman era begins with April 24, B. C. 753, and commemorates the founding of the city of Rome. The Mohammedans count their years from the flight of Mohammed to Medina (the Hegira). Their era dates from July 16, A. D. 622. It is quite probable that the beginning of their era coincides more nearly with the event it is to commemorate than the Christian, Jewish or Roman does, while the Jewish is certainly farthest out of the way.

JOHN D. MEESE.

(Condensed). The Christian era, which is the one in which we have the greatest interest, commemorates the birth of our Lord. It is, however, obviously an error, inasmuch as Herod, who was alive at the birth of Christ and some months afterwards, died four years before the beginning of the Christian era. All that we can learn of the enrollment which took Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, or taxation, as the Evangelists call it, tends to show an earlier date than our era. Other data of calculation also indicate the same conclusion.

the angels, who in the Book of Job are specially designated the "Sons of God" (38: 7). Then, highest of all, in a sense absolute, unapproachable, divine, we have Jesus Christ, pre-eminently God's own Son. There is no need, therefore, to stumble at the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God; only we need to distinguish between what is implied in the moral outward and the more inward relationship.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

Acorns may become oaks, but many of them don't. They have the oak within, potentially. If you read John about as follows: "God has established his sonship that it may be made sure in man by receiving the Christ life," it would neither strain the sense nor conflict in any way with Paul's idea. It is thus an eternal law awaiting individual application. Paul's position seems to be that divine sonship is an inherent and innate potentiality in humanity, ready to become dynamic through the man's initiative, induced by a knowledge of the truth and perfected through its acceptance. See also Christ in John 8, where he calls attention to the rejection by some natural sons of Abraham of spiritual and ethical likeness, thereby rejecting the real heredity.

G. F. GOODENOUGH.

Miscellaneous Questions

B. B., Baltimore, Md. Are you still receiving contributions for the support of the orphans of India, or have they been provided for?

Our American missionaries have gathered up 22,000 Hindu orphans, and far less than half of this number are provided for; and, of course, humanity demands that we still continue our India work. Fifteen dollars sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Orphan Work, Bible House, New York, at one time or in quarterly payments will support one orphan one year, the orphan to be under the care of any religious denomination the giver may name.

Mr. Mark Lanahan, Lawrence, Mass., writes:

Question No. 6, in your issue of November 7, answered by Charles Lansdown and several others, is not correct. The answer given assumes that the distance around the world in a due easterly course on the parallel of New York city is the same as the circumference of the earth at the equator. This is not true. As the degrees of longitude approach each other from the equator to the poles, where they intersect, the length of one degree at latitude 40 deg. 50 sec., or the latitude of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, is a little more than fifty miles, or about three-fourths of the length of a degree at the equator. Therefore the eagle would arrive at its starting point in about one hundred and eighty-eight days. The eagle flying eastward would see one less sunrise and sunset than the resident of New York city.

Additional answers to the question have been received from F. A. Farrgrave, C. H. Thorpe, New Haven, Conn., and others.

Louise C. Tower, Cohasset, Mass., writes, relative to a question which was answered in "The Mail-Bag" lately, viz., Was Christmas ever a fast-day?

In 1644 the Long Parliament ordered that December 25th should be observed as a fast. This was not pleasing to the people, who were requested to spend it bemoaning their sins and the sins of their fathers, which they have been accustomed to commit at Christmas.

Workingwoman, Elmira, N. Y. 1. How many labor organizations are there in the State of New York? 2. Is the number increasing? 3. How many women unionists are there as compared with men? 4. What are their earnings as compared with those of men?

1. September 30, 1899, there were 1,320 labor organizations in this State, with a membership of 209,026. 2. In 1897, the number of unions was 927, with a membership of 142,570. 3. The rate is four per cent. Women are engaged in but few trades—principally in textile, clothing and tobacco. 4. Report of Bureau of Labor Statistics for 1899 shows decided difference. While the majority of men were earning at least $150 each quarter, women earned between $50 and $125.

Mrs. Frank S. A true Christian will not slight a person because of poor appearance or social standing. He will regard all men as brothers. Such a course as you have indicated would be the policy of a Pharisee.

R. V. M., Brownville, Neb. "No man can serve two masters." No one can be a Christian and make the wrecking of bodies and souls his daily business.

F. L. S., Brantford, Ont. It has been wisely said that "the worst use to which you can put a man is to kill him." In the case of a minor, however, who has not yet reached the full age of discretion and responsibility, capital punishment is a violation of civilized usage. Life imprisonment is generally recognized to be the proper punishment.

The Best Book for the Unconverted Sailor

More than eight hundred suggestions have been received in response to the letter of Ethel G., published in our issue of January 16th. The letter read:

I have an unconverted brother in the Navy. Send him something to read that will help to save him. Pick out the book yourself, and ask God to help you choose it. He has a Bible, a Testament, and a Hymn-book.

The question was, what book would be most serviceable to him? We invited free suggestions. A book had already been presented, but in order to induce our readers to give the matter careful and prayerful consideration, we agreed to send, for the first answer received in which the choice coincided with the book already sent, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, bound in genuine smooth calf, and lined with moire silk, and to the two next best answers, not making the same selection, a copy of the Red Letter New Testament, bound in genuine seal, with calf lining.

Answers received on or after February 1st were not counted. The total vote was as follows:

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS	267	THE WAY TO GOD	38
IN HIS STEPS	128	IMITATION OF CHRIST	21
RED LETTER TESTAMENT	65	FROM MANGER TO THRONE	19
LIFE OF D. L. MOODY	50	THE PATHWAY OF LIFE	13
COME TO JESUS	43	GREATEST THING IN THE WORLD	12

Many have voted for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and many also for Dr. Talmage's sermons. Over two hundred miscellaneous books received from one to nine votes each.

The book which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent the young sailor, before suggestions were invited, was "Sowing and Reaping," by D. L. Moody.

The first answer received coinciding with this choice was from Frank C. Witten, of Buffalo, N. Y., to whom we have forwarded a Red Letter Testament, bound in genuine smooth calf, lined with moire silk.

The two next best answers, voting for "Pilgrim's Progress" and "In His Steps," were received first from Miss E. J. G. Miller, of Charleston, S. C., and Grace Perveil, of Baltimore, Md., to whom we have forwarded a Red Letter Testament, bound in genuine seal, with calf lining.

3. What are the chief races of the world, and why are we placed among the Aryans?

The most convenient classification of the people of the world gives three groups or "families": (1) the Semitic, (2) the Hamitic, (3) the Aryan or Japhetic. The original seat of the Aryans is conjectured to have been somewhere in Asia, although some authors claim that it was in Europe. Those authors who claim that the original seat was in Asia hold that about 3000 B. C. Aryan migrations began. Some went no farther than Asia, and these to-day are the Hindus, Medes and Persians. Some crossed the Hellespont into Southern Europe and became the progenitors of the Romans and Greeks. Then bodies crossed over in Central Europe, and these were the Celts. Following the Celts were the Teutons, who pushed the Celts westward until the latter held only the extreme western part of Europe, and are represented to-day by the Irish, and Welsh, and Scots. Following the Teutons were the Slavs, who also settled in Europe. The whole of Europe then, with the exception of the Turks, Hungarians, Finns and Lapps, belongs to the Aryan family. As the settlers of America practically all came from Europe, America is also Aryan.

CHAS. E. WORKMAN.

4. What are the Christian, Jewish, Roman and Mohammedan eras, and what events do they commemorate?

The Christian era commemorates the birth of Christ and begins with January 1, A. D. 1. Some chronologists, however, hold that Taking all the ascertained facts into account, it seems probable that the year known in our chronology as the year B. C. 5 was the date of Christ's birth, and therefore if we were accurately to date our years from that event this would be the year 1906.

ROBERT WYNN.

Correct answers have been received also from G. E. Krauth, M. K. Railey, Amelia Hoyt, M. G. Brownell, F. C. Sherry, S. L. Sawyer, E. C. Robinson, Bessie Sidman, Caroline Schneider, L. T. Rightsell, L. B. Russell, H. S. Williamson, S. T. G., and E. G. Brackensick.

5. Are men by nature children of God, as Paul said (Acts 17: 28) or do they have to experience a change to become such, as John says (John 1: 12)?

There is a large and true sense in which all mankind are children of God. Paul could say to the idolaters at Athens, "We are also his offspring." But there is a higher, closer, nearer sense in which regenerated men only are God's children. John says: "To as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God." Speaking pointedly to believers, he says, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God." So there is no discrepancy between Paul and John. The one is speaking of God's children in the large human sense, while the other speaks of them in the restricted, adopted sense. We have, in fact, to recognize four grades of sonship. In the lowest grade there is the whole human family. In the next higher grade we have the regenerated children, who are really children in the spirit. Then in the next grade, we have

LIFTING UP THE CROSS IN CHINA

TO receive letters from our missionaries in China and read first-hand reports of the Lord's work in that land, is a blessing which Christians the world over learned last summer to appreciate at highest value, and the time has not yet passed when hands do not tremble with unwonted eagerness when opening an envelope addressed in familiar writing and bearing a Chinese postmark. Many friends in this country will read with warm interest the following extracts from a letter dated "Hinghua, China, via Foochow, Dec. 11, 1900," and signed by Mrs. W. N. Brewster, missionary at that station. Mrs. Brewster says: "China needs help more than ever. New responsibilities and duties are placed upon us because of the new opportunities and demands, purchased at great and terrible cost the past summer. Suffering and martyrdom for Christ will not have been in vain. Our educational work receives many calls for teachers. The Christian church should be able to meet this call fully if she would educate, as she should, the leaders and teachers of the new China."

"We have a school doing good work here at under great disadvantages. We occupy a rented hovel built about the time the Pilgrim Fathers landed from the Mayflower. It has earth floors (mud when it rains), walls of clay, small windows opening on courts, and it is dark, damp and unwholesome. We want to build."

"Last year I asked our friends in America for 'Valentine offerings'—that is, any one who would might send us the price of a Valentine, to be applied toward building a school-house here; generous responses are coming in, and when the trouble with China broke out, we had received $1,500, only needing $1,000 additional to put up our building. Our boys have made steady progress; the conduct of most of them has been exemplary, and is occasion for our deep thankfulness; steadfastness under such tests as have tried native Christians in China is indeed evidence of a faith laid on sure foundations. We have forty students in the high school, where we teach English, the sciences, and always the Bible. Advance made in some studies surprise us. Our lower school children are doing good work; from this department they pass into the high school as rapidly as we can prepare them. Were we better housed, we could have hundreds where we have dozens. Our young men personal safety of missionaries in her section Mrs. Brewster speaks cheerfully. It is sad to think of mission buildings in ruins throughout China—China which stands in such terrible need of the Gospel are most earnest and active in Christian work; and we hope to send forth each year many native missionaries to labor among their brethren in China. If any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD care to hear more of our school, they can direct inquiries to me here (Hinghua, China, via Foochow)." On the question of the future of the Son of God. We base our best hopes for that land upon the work to be done by native missionaries sent forth from schools like that at Hinghua, and from schools in America, where young Chinese are being educated to see where their own duty lies in Christianizing their brethren here and in China. The school at San Francisco, which is pictured on this page, is doing much excellent work in this direction, as are similar institutions in other American cities.

Could the high-caste women of China but be reached by the Gospel, China would quickly find honorable place in the rank and file of progressive nations, for the sons of these women will be the men who influence China. Unfortunately, these women are most difficult of access; the oriental idea of seclusion hedges them round with almost impassable barriers; and so one cannot look to the mothers of the Celestial Empire for the regenerative influence which mothers of Christian lands exercise over their country's fortunes. Still, they are beginning to appreciate our medical missionaries, whose skill, under God's providence, has been able so often to save them and their loved ones from pain and death. In various instances, too, these poor, crippled dames of the Orient, have evinced a desire to acquire knowledge at the hands of Christian instructors; and it is not too much to hope that in an increasing number of wealthy and noble homes in China, native wives and mothers are teaching little ones to pray to "Our Father, who art in heaven."

This story is told of the wife of a wealthy Chinese merchant in this country. She was ill unto death; over her bed hung her husband's Joss, to which he made continual prayers for her recovery, burning incense, and neglecting no act of pagan piety to influence the idol to save her. His child had died three months before, although the Joss hung overhead. The wife, almost persuaded to become a Christian by the missionary who visited her, pleaded: "Take the Joss down and pray to Jesus." At last, the despairing husband, removing it with trembling hands, tried to join the missionary and his wife in Christian prayer. He surrendered, superstitions hindering her recovery, and admitted an American physician. After her restoration to health, this lady won many of her friends to accept the faith which had done so much for her. Other Chinese ladies, influenced by some similar experience, are bringing their sisters to Christ. Would there were a multitude of such advocates!

WICKED SILENCE

A SERMON BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

TEXT, Mark 9: 25:

Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him

HERE was a case of great domestic anguish. The son of the household was possessed of an evil spirit, which, among other things, paralyzed his tongue and made him speechless. When the influence was on the patient, he could not say a word—articulation was impossible. The spirit that captured this member of the household was a dumb spirit—so called by Christ—a spirit abroad to-day, and as lively and potent as in New Testament times. Yet, in all the realms of sermonology, I cannot find a discourse concerning this dumb devil which Christ charged upon in my text, saying: "Come out of him."

There has been much destructive superstition abroad in the world concerning possession by evil spirits. Under the form of belief in witchcraft, this delusion swept the continents. Persons were supposed to be possessed with some evil spirit, which made them able to destroy others. In the sixteenth century, in Geneva, 1,500 persons were burned to death as witches. Under one judge, in Lorraine, 900 persons were burned to death as witches. In one neighborhood of France 1,000 persons were burned. In two centuries 200,000 persons were slain as witches. So mighty was that it included among its victims some of the greatest intellects of all time, such as Chief Justice Matthew Hale and Sir Edward Coke, and such renowned ministers of religion as Cotton Mather, one of whose books, Benjamin Franklin said, shaped his life—and Richard Baxter, and Archbishop Cranmer, and Martin Luther; and, among writers and philosophers, Lord Bacon. That belief, which has become the laughing stock of all sensible people, counted its disciples among the wisest and best people of Sweden, Germany, England, France, Spain and New England. But while we reject witchcraft, any man who believes the Bible must believe that there are diabolical agencies abroad in the world. While there are ministering spirits to bless, there are infernal spirits to hinder, to poison, and to destroy. Christ was speaking to a spiritual existence, when, standing before the afflicted one of the text, he said, "Thou dumb and deaf spirit, come out of him."

Against this dumb devil of the text, I put you on your guard. Do not think that this agent of evil has put his blight on those who, by omission of the vocal organs, have had the golden gates of speech bolted and barred. Among those who have never spoken a word are the most gracious and lovely and talented souls that were ever incarnated. The chaplains of the asylums for the dumb can tell you enchanting stories of those, who never called the name of father or mother or child, and many of the most devout and prayerful souls will never, in this world, speak the name of God or Christ. Many a deaf-mute have I seen with the angel of intelligence seated at the window of the eye, who never came forth from the door of the mouth. What a miracle of loveliness and knowledge was Laura Bridgman, of New Hampshire, not only without faculty of speech, but without hearing and without sight, all these faculties removed by sickness when two years of age, yet, becoming a wonder at needlework, at the piano, at the sewing machine, and an intelligent student of the Scriptures, and confounding philosophers, who came from all parts of the world to study the phenomenon. Thanks to Christianity for what it has done for the amelioration of the condition of the deaf and the dumb. Back in the ages, they were put to death as having no right, with such paucity of equipment, to live, and for centuries they were classed among the idiotic and unsafe. But in the sixteenth century came Pedro Ponce, the Spanish monk, and in the seventeenth century came Juan Pablo Bonet, another Spanish monk, with dactylology, or the finger alphabet; and in our own century, we have had John Braidwood and Drs. Mitchell and Ackerly and Peet and Gallaudet, who have given to uncounted thousands of those whose tongues were forever silent, the power to spell out on the air by a manual alphabet their thoughts about this world, and their hopes for the next. We rejoice in the brilliant inventions in behalf of those who were born dumb. One of the most impressive audiences I ever addressed was in the far West, an audience of about six hundred persons, who had or spoken a word, an interpreter standing beside me while I addressed them. I congratulated that audience on two advantages they had over the most of us—the one, that they escaped hearing a great many disagreeable things, and, on the other fact, that they escaped saying things they were sorry for afterward. Yet, after all the alleviations, a shackled tongue is an appalling limitation. But, we are not this morning speaking of congenital mutes. We mean those who are born with all the faculties of vocalization, and yet have been struck by the evil one mentioned in the text—the dumb devil to whom Christ called, when he said, "Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him."

There has been apotheosization of silence. Some one has said silence is golden, and sometimes the greatest triumph is to keep your mouth shut. But sometimes silence is a crime and the direct result of the baleful influence of the dumb devil of our text. There is hardly a man or woman who has not been present on some occasion when the Christian religion became a target for raillery. Perhaps it was over in the store some day when there was not much going on and the clerks were in a group; or it was in the factory at the noon spell; or it was out on the farm under the trees while you were resting; or it was in the club-room; or it was in a social circle; or it was in the street on the way home from business; or it was on some occasion which you remember without my describing it. Some one got the laugh on the Bible and caricatured the profession of religion as hypocrisy, or made a pun out of something that Christ said. The laugh started and you joined in, and not one word of protest did you utter.

What Kept You Silent?

Was it modesty? No. Incapacity to answer? No. Lack of opportunity? No. It was a blow on both your lips by the wing of the dumb devil. If some one should malign your father, or mother, or wife, or husband, or child, you would flush up quick, and either with an indignant word, or doubled up fist, make response. And yet here is our Christian religion, which has done so much for you, and so much for the world that it will take all eternity to celebrate it, and yet, when it was attacked, you did not so much as say: "I differ. I object. I am sorry to hear you say that. There is another side to this." You Christian people ought in such times as these to go armed, not with earthly weapons, but with the sword of the Spirit. You ought to have four or five questions with which you could confound any man who attacks Christianity. A man ninety years old was telling me how he put to flight a scoffer. My aged friend said to the sceptic: "Did you ever read the history of Joseph in the Bible?" "Yes," said the man, "it is a fine story, and as interesting a story as I ever read." "Well, now," said my old friend, "suppose that account of Joseph stopped half way?" "Oh," said the man, "then it would not be entertaining." "Well now," said my friend, "we have in this world only half of everything, and do you not think that when we hear the last half, things may be consistent, and that then we may find that God was right?"

Oh, friends, better load up with a few interrogation points. You cannot afford to be silent when God and the Bible and the things of eternity are assailed. Your silence gives consent to the bombardment of your Father's house. You allow a slur to be cast on your mother's dying pillow. In behalf of the Christ, who for you went through the agonies of assassination on the rocky bluff back of Jerusalem, you dared not face a sickly joke. Better load up with a few questions, so that next time you will be ready. Say to the scoffer: "My dear sir, will you tell me what makes the difference between the condition of woman in China and the United States? What do you think of the sermon on the Mount? How do you like the golden rule laid down in the Scriptures? Are you in favor of the ten commandments? In your large and extensive reading have you come across a lovelier character than Jesus Christ? Will you please to name the triumphant death-beds of infidels and atheists? How do you account for the fact that, among the

in Christianity were such men as Benjamin Franklin, John Ruskin, Thomas Carlyle, Babington Macaulay, William Penn, Walter Scott, Charles Kingsley, Horace Bushnell, James A. Garfield, Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Admiral Foote, Admiral Farragut, Ulysses S. Grant, John Milton, William Shakespeare, Chief Justice Marshall, John Adams, Daniel Webster, George Washington? How do you account for their fondness for the Christian religion? Among the innumerable colleges and universities of the earth will you name me three, started by infidels and now supported by infidels? Down in your heart are you really happy in the position you occupy antagonistic to the Christian religion? When do you have the most rapturous views of the next world?" Go at him with a few such questions, and he will get so red in the face as to suggest apoplexy, and he will look at his watch and say he has an engagement, and must go. You will put him in a sweat that will beat a Turkish bath. You will put him on a rout compared with which our troops at Bull Run made no time at all. Arm yourself, not with arguments, but interrogation points, and I promise you victory. Shall such a man as you, shall such a woman as you surrender to one of the meanest spirits that ever smoked up from the pit—the dumb devil spoken of in the text?

But then there are occasions when this particular spirit that Christ exorcised when he said: "I charge thee to come out of him," takes people by the wholesale. In the most responsive religious audience have you noticed how many people never sing at all? They have a book and they have a voice and they know how to read. They know many of the tunes, and yet are silent while the great pass by. Among those who sing not one out of a hundred sings loud enough to hear his own voice. They hum it. They give a sort of religious grunt. They make the lips go, but it is inaudible. With a voice strong enough to stop a street car one block away, all they can afford in the praise of God is about half a whisper. With enough sopranos, enough altos, enough bassos to make a small heaven between the four walls they let the opportunity go by unimproved. The volume of voice that ascends from the largest audience that ever assembled ought to be multiplied about two thousand-fold. But the minister rises and gives out the hymn the organ begins; the choir or precent leads; the audience are standing so that the lungs may have full expansion, and mighty harmony is about to ascend, when the evil spirit spoken of in my text—the dumb devil—spreads his two wings, and over the lips of one-half the audience a the other wing over the lips of the other half of the audience, and the voices back into the throats from which they started, and only here and there anything is heard, and nine-tenths of the

is destroyed; and the dumb devil, as flies away, says: "I could not keep Isaac Watts from writing that hymn, and could not keep Lowell Mason from composing the tune to which it is set, but smote into silence or half silence the lips from which it would have spread abroad to bless neighborhoods and cities, and then mount the wide-open heavens." Give the long-metre doxology the full support of Christendom, and those four lines would take the whole earth for God.

During the cotton famine in Lancashire, England, when the suffering was something terrific, as the first wagon-load of cotton rolled in, the starving people hooked the horses and drew the loaves themselves, singing, until all Lancashire joined in with triumphant voices, the cheeks sopping with tears: "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." When Commodore Perry, with his war-ship, the Mississippi, lay off the coast of Japan, bombarded the shores with "Old Hundred" played by the marine band. Grievous "Old Hundred," composed by William Franc of Germany. In a war prison at ten o'clock at night, the poor fellow far from home, and wounded and sick and dying, one prisoner started the "Old Hundred Doxology," and then a score of voices joined, then all the prisoners on the floors took up the acclaim until the building, from foundation to top-story fairly quaked with the melodious ascension. A British man-of-war, lying off a foreign coast, heard a voice singing the doxology, and immediately guessed, a guessed aright, that there was an English man in captivity to the Mohammedans; and in the small boats the sailors rowed to shore and burst into a guard-house and set the captive free. I do not know what the trumpets of resurrection shall play but it may be the doxology which is now sounding across Christendom. How much more hearty we would be in our songs and how easily we could drive back the dumb devil from all our worshipping assemblages, if we could realize that nearly all our hymns have a stirring history

Famous Hymns

That glorious hymn "Stand up for Jesus" was suggested by the last words of Dudley Tyng, who was dying from having his right arm torn off by a threshing machine. That hymn, "What a Friend we have in Jesus," heard through a telephone, converted an obdurate soul. "Shall we gather at the River?" was a hymn first sung in Brooklyn Prospect Park, at the children's May anniversary, and then started to encircle the world. "Where is my wandering boy to-night?" is a song that has saved hundreds of dissipated young men. Tom, the drummer-boy in the army, was found crying, and an officer asked him what was the matter! "Oh," he said, "I had a dream last night. My sister died ten years ago, and my mother never with herself again, and she died soon after. Last night I dreamt I was killed in battle and that mother and sister came down to meet me." After the next battle was over some one, crossing the field, heard a voice that he recognized as the voice of Tom, the drummer boy, singing, "Jesus, lover of my soul." But at the end of the first verse, the voice became very feeble, and the end of the second verse it stopped, they went up and found Tom, the summer boy, leaning against a stump, dead.

That hymn "O for a thousand tongues to sing" was suggested to Charles Wesley by Peter Bohler, who, after his conversion, said: "I had better keep silent about it." "No," said Wesley, "if you have ten thousand tongues you had better use them for Christ." And then that anonymous hymnology penned the words:

O for a thousand tongues to sing,
My dear Redeemer's praise,
The glories of my God and King,
The triumphs of his grace.

Jesus, the name that calms our fears,
That bids our sorrows cease;
'Tis music in the sinner's ears,
'Tis life and health and peace.

While much of the modern music is a regions doggerel, a consecrated nonsense, a sacred imbecility, I would like to see some great musician of our time lift the hymn and "marshal Luther's Judgment Hymn, Yarmouth, Dundee, Ariel, Brattlestreet, Uxbridge, Pleyel's Hymn, Harwell, A'loch, Mount Pisgah and Coronation, with a few regiments of mighty tunes made in our own time, and storm Asia, Africa and America for the Kingdom of God. But the first thing to do is to drive out the dumb devil of the text from all our churches.

Wasted Opportunities

Do not, however, let us lose ourselves in generalities. Not one of us but has had our lives sometimes touched by the spirit of the text—this awful dumb devil. We had just one opportunity of saving a Christian word that might have led a man or woman into a Christian life. That opportunity was fairly put before us. The word of invitation or consolation or warning came to the inside gate of the mouth, but there it halted. Some hindering power locked the jaws together so that they did not open. The tongue lay flat and still in the bottom of the mouth as though struck with paralysis. We were mute. Though God had given us the physiological apparatus for speech, and our lungs were filled with air which, by the command of our will, could have made the laryngeal muscles move and the vocal organs vibrate, we were wickedly and fatally silent. For all time and eternity we missed our chance. Or it was a prayer-meeting, and the service was thrown open for prayer and remarks, and there was a dead halt—everything silent as a grave-yard at midnight. Indeed it was a grave-yard and midnight. An embarrassing pause took place that put a wet blanket on all the meeting. Men, bold enough on business exchange or in worldly circles, shut their eyes as though they were praying in silence, but they were not praying at all. They were busy hoping somebody else would do his duty. The women flushed under and made their fans more rapidly flutter. Some brother, with no cold, coughed, by that sound trying to fill up the time, and the meeting was slain. But what killed it?—the dumb devil. This is the way I account for the fact that the stupidest places on earth are some prayer meetings. I do not see how a man keeps any grace if he regularly attends them. They are spiritual refrigerators. Religion kept on ice. How many of us have lost occasions of usefulness. In a sculptor's studio stood a figure of the god Opportunity. The sculptor had made the hair fall down over the face of the statue so as to completely cover it, and there were wings to the feet. When asked why he so represented Opportunity, the sculptor answered: "The face of the statue is thus covered up because we do not recognize Opportunity when it comes, and the wings to the feet show that Opportunity is swiftly gone."

But do not let the world deride the Church because of all this, for the dumb devil is just as conspicuous in the world.

The great political parties assemble at the proper time to build platforms for the candidates to stand on. A committee of each party is appointed to make the platform. After proper deliberation, the committees come in with a ringing report: "Whereas," and "Whereas," and "Whereas." Pronouncements all shaped with the one idea of getting the most votes. All expression in regard to the great moral evils of the country ignored. No expression in behalf of temperate living, for that would lose the vote of the liquor traffic. No expression in regard to the universal attempt at the demolition of the Lord's Day. No recognition of God in the history of nations, for that would lose the vote of atheists. But "Whereas," and "Whereas," and "Whereas." Nine cheers will be given for the platform. The dumb devil of the text puts one wing over the one platform, and the other wing over the other platform. Those great conventions are opened with prayer by their chaplains. If they avoided platitudes, and told the honest truth in their prayers, they would say: "O, Lord, we want to be Postmasters and Consuls and Foreign Ministers and United States District Attorneys. For that we are here, and for that we will strive till the election next November. Give us office, or we die. Forever and ever, Amen." The world, to say the least, is no better than the church on this subject of

Silence at the Wrong Time

In other words, is it not quite time for Christianity to become pronounced and aggressive as never before? Take sides for God and sobriety and righteousness. "If the Lord be God, follow him; if Baal, then follow him." Have you opportunity of rebuking a sin? Rebuke it. Have you a chance to cheer a disheartened soul? Cheer it. Have you a useful word to speak? Speak it.

Be out and out, up and down for righteousness. If your ship is afloat on the Pacific Ocean of God's mercy, hang out your colors from mast-head. Show your passport if you have one. Do not smuggle your soul into the harbor of heaven.

Speak Out for God!

Close the list of lost opportunities, and open a new chapter. Before you get to the door on your way out, shake hands with someone, and ask him to join you on the road to heaven. Do not drive up to heaven in a two-wheeled "sulky" with room only for one, and that yourself, but get the biggest Gospel wagon you can find, and pile it full of friends and neighbors, and shout till they hear you all up and down the skies, "Come with us, and we will do you good, for the Lord hath promised good concerning Israel." The opportunity for good which you may consider insignificant may be tremendous for results, as when on the sea, Captain Haldane swore at the ship's crew with an oath that wished them all in perdition, and a Scotch sailor touched his cap, and said, "Captain! God hears prayer, and we would be badly off if your wish were answered." Captain Haldane was convicted by the sailor's remark and converted, and became the means of the salvation of his brother Robert, who had been an infidel, and then Robert became a minister of the Gospel, and under his ministry the godless Felix Neff became the world-renowned missionary of the Cross, and the worldly Merle D'Aubigne became the author of The History of the Reformation, and will be the glory of the Church for all ages. Perhaps you may do as much as the Scotch sailor who just tipped his cap, and used one broken sentence by which the earth and the heavens are still resounding with potent influences. Do something for God, and do it right away, or you will never do it at all.

Time flies away fast,
The while we never remember;
How soon our life here
Grows old with the year
That dies with the next December.

• • • Mrs. • Nation • and • the • Saloon • • •

PUBLIC attention has recently been drawn to the remarkable crusade against the Kansas saloons, conducted by Mrs. Carrie Nation. As many different accounts of the matter have appeared in the daily prints, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has requested Mr. David Nation, the husband, to furnish the facts, which he has now done in the letter which gives the history of the crusade up to January 23. On December 26 or 27, Mrs. Nation entered the saloon of the Cary Hotel, Wichita; broke bottles, spilled liquor, demolished a mirror and a large picture of Cleopatra. For this act she was arrested and confined in the county jail at Wichita. The members of the State W. C. T. U. employed lawyers and met at the jail almost daily and held prayer meetings in her cell. To exasperate the saloon element. A pretext was found for quarantining the prisoner, and no one was allowed to see her. Her lawyers were not even permitted to see or talk to her. Her trial was set for January 5, when her lawyers appeared and announced ready for trial, provided Mrs. Nation would be brought out, which was refused. A bond worth $250,000 was tendered, but was refused, because "the jail was quarantined." The lawyers then presented a petition to the District Court, then in session, for a writ of Habeas Corpus, but the judge even refused to permit it to be read in his court. Her lawyers then went to the Supreme Court at Topeka with a similar petition, and the 12th of January was set for the hearing. The quarantine was again set up as an excuse for not producing the body of Mrs. Nation. Her lawyers, however, proved to the satisfaction of the Court that there was no record of a quarantine. On the 15th, the Court ordered the quarantine raised and Mrs. Nation brought out, although the order to raise the quarantine did not expire until the 21st. In the meantime they offered to let Mrs. Nation out of jail on discharge her, provided she would sign a contract releasing all parties from civil suit for damages. This she refused to do. They then offered to release her, pay her fare to Kansas City, Mo., and the jailer and his wife to accompany her, provided she would leave after night, and no one to know it. This was referred to her lawyers, who refused, because they believed it was an attempt to kidnap her.

As soon as she was released on bail, she went to Norton, Hutchinson, Nickerson and Sterling, where she addressed large audiences. Mrs. Nation returned to Wichita, where her trial was set for Monday, the 21st, but before her arrival the authorities dismissed the case. The contention of Mrs. Nation's lawyers is as follows:

Every man who goes into the courts asking for a remedy for a supposed wrong must go with clean hands. This the saloon man can not do, as he is compelled to admit that he is in open violation of the law, by which he claims redress, every hour in the day.

All places in Kansas where intoxicating liquors are sold or given away and where people assemble to drink such liquors, are declared common nuisances, and all liquors, bottles, jugs, chairs, tables, shelves, counters, screens, and other property used in maintaining such nuisance are to be publicly destroyed. Hence, such property when so used is of no value.

3. The destruction of this class of property, when so used, was simply to prevent crime. If a person sees two men in combat, one with a revolver in hand, shooting at the other, and a man rushes in and wrenches the revolver from his hand, dashes it against a stone, and breaks it to pieces, he is guiltless. But in Wichita, the sworn officers of the law would arrest the man for maliciously destroying a pistol, but would let the man go free who was doing the shooting. The Kansas saloon-keeper is violating the law every day. The means he uses is destroyed, but the woman who destroyed the means used to violate the law is arrested, and cast into jail.

Mrs. Nation has visited other Kansas towns besides Wichita, and in some places has successfully repeated the saloon raids. Up to the present time every charge made against her in court has been dismissed. She has announced her intention, at the conclusion of her Kansas crusade, of coming to New York to enlist an army of women for the purpose of anti-saloon agitation in that city.

Mrs. Nation's example has not been without its influence in other parts of Kansas. At Anthony, fourteen members of the W. C. T. U. wrecked a drug store and two saloons, their leader being Mrs. Mary Sheriff, of Danville. In the party were Mrs. M. J. Teavis, Mrs. William Scott, Mrs. F. H. Brubacker, Mrs. Louise Tracey, Mrs. T. J. Hoopes, Mrs. Charles Robinson, Mrs. John Kendall, Mrs. Pickens, Mrs. Kendall, Mrs. J. H. Shelton, Miss Sophia McKay, Miss Lucy Page, Miss Ethel Massey, Miss Bertha Robinson and Miss Jennie Hixon. They used hatchets, pickaxes and hammers, and while they attacked, some of their male relatives stood outside, prepared to prevent undue interference. All the women were heavily veiled during the active crusade. After the raid they knelt down on the sidewalk and prayed. No attempt was made by the authorities to interfere with them. All the saloons in Anthony closed temporarily, hoping that the violence of the crusade would soon die out. Except in the case of Mrs. Nation, who has been repeatedly attacked, and whose life even has been threatened, no actual violence has been offered to the crusaders. At one place a saloon employee stood behind barricaded doors, with a pistol, ready to shoot, but was prevented, and what might have been a tragedy was averted. The women of Anthony, Danville, and other towns are aroused over the crusade, and the excitement is extending rapidly. Another crusade on similar lines is being conducted by Mrs. Lucy Wilhoise in Wichita, where eight saloons have been raided, and $6,000 worth of property wrecked.

All the indications point to a widespread crusade throughout the State of Kansas, in opposition to the saloons, and exciting developments may be expected.

JESUS IN GETHSEMANE

International Sunday School Lesson
for February 24th. Matt. 26: 36-46.

GETHSEMANE'S conflict includes:
1. Temptation. 2. Loneliness. 3. Sorrow. 4. Prayer. 5. Resignation.

Pray, that ye enter not into temptation. Jesus had just said to his apostles, "All ye shall be offended in me this night" (v. 31), replying to the proud boast,

Battling with Temptation "I will lay down my life for thee," which Peter had spoken, and all the apostles had adopted (John 13: 37). They would have been better equipped with less pride and more prayer. When Jesus left them in one part of Gethsemane's garden to pray by himself for strength to bear his temptation, he bade them pray also for strength to bear theirs, the temptations to cowardice and unfaithfulness which he saw just ahead; but they chose sleep instead of prayer, and so failed in the trying hour, while he triumphed, through prayer, in his greater temptation to avoid the death and shame that were confronting him in the path of duty. The word translated "agony" means conflict. No doubt the wilderness temptations were repeated, the temptation to use the power of miracle to save himself and startle his foes, and the temptation to set up a temporal kingdom of deliverance for his country at once, rather than a slowly-developed world-kingdom of spiritual deliverance through the cross.

"The agony in Gethsemane then denoted not so much keen suffering as a tremendous conflict. It was the culmination of the Tempt-er's plot. If he failed then, he was vanquished forever." And he did fail.

Sit ye here while I go yonder and pray. Jesus knew there were depths in his agony into which his apostles

Treading the Wine Press Alone could not enter, and so he went away alone to pray. The desire for human sympathy, which is strongest in hearts that are richest in affection, drove him back to his three most spiritual apostles again and again and yet again; but they were sleeping.

They were weary with sorrows of their own and could not enter into his deepest griefs. So in our own lives, "every heart knows its own bitterness." Some lighter griefs we can share with others, but every wife carries some anxiety that she cannot share with her husband; and the husband lies awake struggling over problems of his own while his wife sleeps.
But as Christ, lacking human sympathy, found help in his loneliness in God, so may we in our lonely agonies find help in him whose sympathies were enriched in his own Gethsemane. In securing herders for our Alaska reindeer, it was found that the Esquimaux, afraid of the night so much darker than their long Polar night, would not watch alone, and so two herders had to be provided where one would have sufficed. So in our nights of trial, we do not watch alone, but with the un-sleeping Shepherd always at our side.

Dr. Cullis tells, in one of his reports, of an aged Christian, who, lying on his death-bed in the Consumptives' Home, was asked the cause of his perfect peace, in a state of such extreme weakness that he was often entirely unconscious of all around him. He replied: "When I am able to think, I think of Jesus; and when I am unable to think of him, I know he is thinking of me." And to how many of the Lord's suffering children have the words of the Psalmist come with sweet consolation: "I am poor and needy; yet the Lord thinketh upon me."

My soul is exceeding sorrowful.
Gethsemane also pictures the mission of sorrow and

The Mission of Pain pain. Those who go with Christ to the Mount of Transfiguration are also called to go with him to the Gethsemane of sorrow, in which Peter might well have said again: "It is good to be here." How nature has been beautified by the great earth agonies!

The beauty of hill and valley, of lake and river, is mostly due to earthquakes and volcanoes; and the splendor of marble and diamond is the work of internal fires.
So what is sweetest in poetry, what is noblest in character, is the work of sorrow and pain, working on a submissive spirit, which receives pain as an angel of God. Sorrow without Christ often works despair, as in the case of one who be-

"NOT MY WILL BUT THINE BE DONE" came heartbroken by the tragic death of a brother and sister, and shut himself up in a lonely farmhouse, and there died a wretched hermit, after a life of unbroken gloom.

Paul was long in the Gethsemane of trial praying for the removal of some "thorn in the flesh," which he regarded as a "messenger of Satan to buffet him." Some have thought it was weak eyes; others that it was a wife; others a wilful child. These, at least, are the "thorns" that other Christians have had to bear. He prayed thrice for the removal of his "thorn," as Christ of his "cup." But in both cases, instead of removing the trial, grace to bear it was given.

A story is told of a woman whose thorns were two maiden aunts, helpless as babes and ceaseless faultfinders, giving back for the loving attendance of ten years only snarls and taunts. Urged to remove them to some old ladies' home, she replied, "It is my cross, and Christ is giving me grace to bear it."

And he went forward about a stone's cast and fell on the ground on his face and prayed.

Here was no formal
The Gethsemane of Prayer prayer, but whole-souled supplication.

Christ's struggle beside the brook Kedron was anticipated in Jacob's wrestling by the brook Jabbok with a divine being he could see and touch, who must therefore have been the Son of God in his Old Testament manifestation. Out of that struggle he came with a blessing and his new title of true nobility, "Israel," meaning one who has power with God and man. Such spiritual power comes only through earnest prayer, that pleads and persists and struggles until victorious. The blessings brought to Scotland by John Knox were not more due to his preaching than to his wrestling prayer,

"Give me Scotland, or I die." But the climax of prayer, both at Jabbok and in Gethsemane, was when the agony of supplication gave place to the quiet acceptance of God's will.

O my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass away from me. There is no adequate explanation of Gethsemane's

Bearing the World's Sin mystic agony that leaves out of it the burden of sin. Charles IX. of France, in youth had tender feelings. When his fiend of a mother, Catharine de Medicis, proposed to him the horrid massacre of St. Bartholomew, he shrank from it. "No, no," he answered, "they are my loving subjects." Then was the critical hour of his life. But as she urged he yielded.

And in the awful anguish of his last hours he said to his physician: "Asleep or awake, I see the mangled forms of the Huguenots. They drip with blood. They make hideous faces at me. They point to their open wounds amock me. Oh, that I had spared at least a little infants at the breast!" And upon the "bloody sweat" burst from his body. So was the burden of sin, the sins of others, the world lying in wickedness which the less but sympathetic Christ felt as his own, a mother feels the guilt of a son as if it wher's—it was such a burden of sin that dr-from Christ's veins the red tears of unspeable agony. Of this supreme physical si-of mental agony the Popular Science Mont- says:

"This rare affection, which has always cited in a high degree the interest and attention of medical observers, consists essentially of a hemorrhage from the unbroken surface of the skin. But, inasmuch as it takes place from the network of small vessels which surround the sweat-glands, and makes its appearance through the opening of the sweat-duct, it is not inappropriately, after all, named 'bloody sweat.' The discharge is generally intermittent, or at least remittent, and paroxysmal in its nature, the intervals varying from a few hours to months. Sometimes it is pure blood which coagulates in crusts or gouts on the surface, sometimes it is so intermixed with serum or the perspiratory fluid as to be merely a more or less deeply colored blood-liquid. Its extent varies extremely; it may make its appearance over the whole or near the whole of the surface of the body, but more commonly it is confined to some selected regions, generally those in which the skin is thin and delicate. It most frequently appears as a more or less copious and continuous oozing from the surface, which, when withdrawn, rapidly or slowly reappears from numerous minute or indistinguishable points, but has been seen to spring up in a distinct form from the surface. Every age and both sexes have furnished examples of it. Bloody sweat may be produced by overwhelming mental emotions, and marks the acme of such partying passions as terror, anguish, despair.

In Christ, the impersonation of courage, innocence and hope, this weeping of the whole body bespeaks his sympathetic identification with the fearful, guilty, despairing so-of men, and whatever else of unspeakable meaning is in those words, "He was made:
for us who knew no sin, that we might made the righteousness of God in him Gethsemane is a mental crucifixion, the hid-foundations of the cross. Its cup was fill with "our transgressions."

In Palestine the fields are dotted with little red flower called "The Saviour's blood drops." It fitly symbolizes the joy and beau-that has been put into human life by the agony of Christ, whose bloody sweat has been a blessed dew that has made every noi-impulse to grow.

We blame the apostles because they would not even sacrifice their sleep to watch with the agonizing Christ. But what are we sacrificing? Do we give him hours taken from sleep for his service? Or even a fair share of our waking hours?

Nevertheless not as I will, but thou wilt. George MacDonald has beautifully said

Triumphant Resignation "If God's will our law, then we we but a kind noble slaves; but when God's will is our will, then are we his free children." Richter said: "I yield my heart to the Purifier; my will to the Will that governs the universe.
Since that Will is also perfect wildom, it is amazing how we struggle against it, seeking to have 'our own way,' a way that has made no end of trouble by its unwisdom.
Better, like Jacob, cease this wrestling and let God have his way."

Arise, let us be going. Our or-like Christ's, should be "from prayer to work, and from work prayer." He had put on the whole armor of God for a week of great battles, the betrayal, the trials, the cross. He who said at the beginning, "Sit ye here," says to us al-"Rise, let us be going." To-day is sitting to watch and pray; tomorrow it is rising and going forto work. "It is good to be here we say; good to be with thee Gethsemane, good to be with thee on the Transfiguration Mount good to be with thee going abo-doing good—but best to be with thee yonder."

"COULD YE NOT WATCH WITH ME ONE HOUR?"

LINCOLN'S ANNIVERSARY

In Remembrance of Abraham Lincoln

EDITORIAL BY
T. DE WITT TALMAGE

THE first time we saw him, we followed into his room a committee who had come to Washington to tell the President how to conduct the war. We do not know who the committee was. The President was the saddest looking man I ever saw. He had a far-away look. He evidently, while standing under the fire of an address which was being made to him, saw the battle-fields and hospitals and conflagrations and national bereavement. One of his great trials was that of being subjected to advice by people of all ages who had no qualification for giving advice. When one of our party asked for his autograph, he cheerfully gave it, asking, "Is this all I can do for you?" At the time he was the most abused man in America. To-day he is the most admired man in all our country's history, with the exception of Washington. My friend, the late Henry W. Grady, then the editor of the Atlanta Constitution, and a typical Southerner, started the North with his appreciation of Abraham Lincoln. It was at a New England dinner at Delmonico's, New York, ten or fifteen years ago. I had in my remarks spoken of the typical American, and that he would appear fifty or seventy-five years from then, and that he would be a compound of many nationalities, that he would have all the best of their characteristics. Mr. Grady following, said, "Mr. Talmage has spoken of the great American as coming fifty or seventy-five years from now. Gentlemen, I have to tell you that the typical American has come. He was Abraham Lincoln!" The effect was electric. That sentiment uttered by a Northern man would not have had such an effect, but it was uttered by a Southern man, whose father fought and died on the Southern side. The whole world now loves the memory of Abraham Lincoln. He was the impersonation of kindness. On my desk as I make this paragraph is a letter in his own handwriting. It was yesterday presented to us by a friend. It was written before the days of typewriting, and is in Mr. Lincoln's own penmanship. The Methodist Conference assembled in Baltimore had passed a resolution of encouragement and sent it to Mr. Lincoln, and this is his reply:

"Gentlemen—In response to your address allow me to attest the accuracy of its historical statements: indorse the sentiment it expresses; and thank you in the nation's name for the sure promise it gives.

"Nobly sustained as the Government has been by all the churches, I would utter nothing which might in the least appear invidious against any. Yet without this it may fairly be said that the Methodist Episcopal Church, not less devoted than the rest, is, by its greater numbers, the most important of all. It is no fault in others that the Methodist Church sends more soldiers to the field, more nurses to the hospital, and more prayers to heaven than any. God bless the Methodist Church—bless all the churches, and blessed be God, who, in this our great trial, giveth us the churches.

A. LINCOLN."

May 18, 1864

There is in the chirography of this letter a calmness, a confidence, and a clearness which give no suggestion of the horrors through which the country was then passing. Every comma, semi-colon, and period is in the right place. Abraham Lincoln was a Presbyterian, yet in this letter he especially compliments another denomination, and asks for the divine blessing on all the denominations. There will probably never be another Abraham Lincoln, for the reason there will probably never again be a need for such a man. He was a great sufferer through his sympathies. General W. T. Sherman showed me, many years ago, in his home at St.

Louis, a picture of a steamboat cabin in which President Lincoln, General Grant, and himself sat during the darkest time of the Civil War. The picture was nothing as a work of art, but General Sherman kept it to bring to mind what was said in that interview. He told me that President Lincoln exclaimed in a great outburst of grief: "I cannot stand it any longer, this bloodshed; how can we stop this war?" What a suggestive picture it was when one had explained to him what occurred in that steamboat cabin. Assassination always kills the wrong man, and a worse deed than the taking off of such a President cannot be imagined. Well may the nation celebrate the anniversary of the birthday of the most renowned man of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, who once said of himself, "Of course, when I came of age I did not know much; still, somehow I could read, write and cipher to the rule of three, but that was all. I have not been to school since. The little advance I now have upon this store of education I have picked up from time to time under the pressure of necessity." Henry W. Grady was right when he corrected me at the Delmonico dinner, and said: "The typical American has come, and he was Abraham Lincoln!"

The Night on Which Lincoln Died

... BY ...
REV. WILLIAM JAMES

I WAS permitted to witness some of the sad scenes at the time the hand of the assassin brought Mr. Lincoln's wonderful life to a close, and I have been requested to chronicle what I remember of that eventful night. While pursuing my studies as a theological student near the close of the war, some desperate battles were fought, and many thousands of our men were wounded. Officials of the Christian Commission at once issued a very earnest appeal, calling for volunteers to care for these wounded and dying men. The call was so urgent that I felt it to be my duty to respond immediately, and, laying aside my studies, in a few hours I reported for duty at the headquarters of the Christian Commission at Washington.

I did not know but that I would be assigned for duty some miles distant in Virginia, near the outposts of the enemy, but it was finally decided to station me in one of the hospitals on the outskirts of the city. For about one month it was my privilege to minister in different ways, temporally and spiritually, to those sick and wounded men. The Christian workers were not required to stop the night at the hospital, but to devote only the daytime to their work, for a few well-trained and efficient nurses were on duty during the hours of the night.

A temporary frame structure, known as the Barracks, had been erected as a lodging-place for the members of the Christian Commission, and this building was located only a few blocks from Ford's Theatre. We were in the city when the tidings of Lee's surrender were received. The announcement called forth many varied expressions of delight, which were exhibited in manifold ways, by the raising of innumerable flags on all private and public buildings, the marching of joyful processions, the discharge of cannons, and grand illuminations. The massive buildings of the Post Office, the War, Navy, and other departments, with light reflected from innumerable tallow candles placed in each small pane of glass, produced an effect which will never be forgotten by those who witnessed the sight.

REV. WILLIAM JAMES

It was during that eventful week that President Lincoln gave his grand speech, his last speech, from the portico of the White House, in the presence of assembled thousands. As he gratefully referred to the close of the war, and spoke of the future bright prospects of our country, each utterance that fell from his lips was long and heartily applauded, and so frequent, at times, were these expressions of approval on the part of our overjoyed people, that it was difficult for him to continue and complete his address.

The people all over the city were boiling over with joyful and patriotic enthusiasm. But who, at that time, in the midst of their exuberant demonstration of joy, thought that in a very few hours their joy would give place to sadness and sorrow, and that clouds of midnight darkness would hang as a pall over the city and the nation. The night following, I was sitting in the barracks of the Christian Commission, writing a letter to the dear ones at home, when suddenly the door flew open and a man rushed in and cried out, "President Lincoln has been assassinated at Ford's Theatre." I seized my hat and ran, and in about five minutes I stood at one of the doors of the theatre, just as several men were bearing out the form of the dying President. The sad news had not yet spread through the city, and the crowd outside for awhile was not very large, but it soon increased in number as the people made their exit from the theatre. For a short distance we accompanied those who were bearing the body, and perceiving that his head was hanging too low, I placed my hand beneath, endeavoring to raise it a little. And as I walked across the street, and with my hand endeavoring to render a little service, I witnessed a scene that is forever indelibly impressed on my mind. I can see now before me the dying form of the President, as if it were but yesterday. The upper portion of his clothing had been pulled down by the physician or surgeon while in the theatre, for at first they did not know what part of his body had received the fatal shot. He was gasping for breath, but not a sound came from his lips, while the blood trickled from the wound to the pavement. The question was asked, "where shall we take him?" but there was very quickly a door thrown open opposite the theatre, and when I reached the steps leading to the upper room, perceiving that the passage way was narrow, and that my services were not needed, and not wishing to intrude, I stepped back.

By this time an immense crowd had assembled, and strong men stood in the street and cried like children. Word then came that Secretary Seward had been assassinated, and that the foe had rallied and was marching into the city. The excitement and confusion were intense.

And the next morning when shortly after seven o'clock, all the bells in the city began tolling, each stroke plainly saying "he is dead," it seemed as if each person in the city had lost a dear relative or friend.

A few days later the funeral service was held, and the large procession in which were General Grant and other famous generals and distinguished civilians wended its way to the Capitol, slowly along the broad and beautiful Pennsylvania avenue, keeping step to the funeral dirges of several bands, while the avenue on either side was lined by many thousands of people. As I looked at the sad expressions of the people with tearful eyes, and at the private and public buildings heavily draped in black, I thought what a striking contrast between what I now heard and saw, and what I witnessed only a few days before, when the people were rejoicing so tumultuously in different ways over the victories that had so lately been achieved. How true the words, "we know not what a day may bring forth," and "in the midst of life we are in death."

I might append just here an appropriate incident in connection with what I have related, and show how a friend of mine at that time on account of mistaken identity, came near losing his life.

The day after the assassination, while diligent search was being made in all directions for the murderer, a well-known friend, at that time engaged in business at Washington, had purchased a railroad ticket, and taken his seat in the car on his way to New York.

Descriptions of Booth had been printed and extensively circulated. Unfortunately, there was some resemblance between my friend and the assassin, and, strange to say, my friend was in the theatre when the fatal shot was fired. He had not been long seated in the car, when he perceived a man standing near, gazing at him, while at the same time he cast occasional glances at a printed piece of paper that he held in his hand. He soon learned that he was being suspected and shadowed by a detective, and a few moments later he was informed that he had been placed under arrest. In the meantime, a telegram had been forwarded to Baltimore, stating that the real assassin had been arrested, and was then on the train en route to the city.

The news spread like wild-fire, and by the time he reached the station, a fierce and angry mob numbering several thousand had assembled. All of my friend's protestations to the officers who had him in charge, with the declaration of the fact that they had arrested an innocent man, and that he could prove his identity by friends living at Baltimore, were of no avail.

A regiment of colored soldiers had to be employed to take him in safety from the train, and he had to walk between them from the depot to the hotel, the soldiers protecting him with pointed bayonets from the attempted assaults of the mob, who cried: "Hang him! shoot him! kill him!" and our friend said he realized that had he succeeded in placing their hands upon him, his earthly life would soon have terminated.

And even after his identity had been established, and innocence had been publicly proclaimed, the crowd continued to remain in front of the hotel. And so intense was the excitement, that the officers did not dare escort my friend through the front vestibule of the hotel, but had to smuggle him through the rear door and into a carriage; he hastened with him to the railroad depot.

A few years after this narrow escape, I had the privilege of uniting this friend in marriage to the lady of his choice with whom he enjoyed many years of married life. I friend also subsequently became a very successful business man, and for a number of years he was an esteemed resident of Brooklyn, N. Y. I think I am not intruding into the privacy of the family circle, or betraying any confidence, if I here give his name—the late Frank Audemars, who had a host of friends in Brooklyn. He recently claimed him as a victim—after a lingering illness—and only a few months ago I was called upon to officiate at the funeral service.

A GREAT SOUTHERN INTER-STATE EXHIBITION

THE South Carolina Inter-State and West Indian Exposition, which is to open in Charleston Dec. 1, 1901, closing June 1, 1902, will follow so close and hard upon the Pan-American Exposition as to furnish the sort of winter sequel to that which the California Mid-winter Fair supplied to Chicago's Columbian Exposition.

From the summer exhibition in beautiful Buffalo by cool Lake Erie, to the winter fair in the balmy southern city on the South Atlantic, will be a pleasing and instructive transition to people who want to see our country just as it is, North and South, while they are taking timely holidays. Americans are charged with the bad habit of going abroad for summer and winter recreations; this custom might well be reversed during the next twelve months by having our European friends come to us; it would be to their profit, as well as to ours, for they could acquire in a short time, and without much travel, a vast amount of knowledge about America and things American.

The famous resorts of Italy and France have no more delightful winter climate than Charleston. While snows are falling elsewhere next winter, Charleston's guests will be walking in gardens of rose and myrtle and jasmine, or under sago palms or pink and white oleander trees; they will be in a land where the fig and the orange and nectarine can be had for the plucking.

The plans for the Fair are that it shall be typically Southern in architectural and other details. Where the Palace of Electricity is the masterpiece of the Pan-American Exposition, the Cotton Palace, covering 50,000 square feet and rising 160 feet high, will be the dominating feature of the Charleston Fair. The latter is to have, however, its own exquisite temple of wizard lights and rainbow fountains on Electrical Island in the Bayou. Along the shore of the Bayou, it is proposed to erect, too, a Chime Tower of imposing height and appropriate design, containing a chime of bells which will ring out over the placid waters of the lake at varying intervals well known hymns and tunes, adding an air of romance and music to the whole scene. This Bayou is the central jewel of a natural park of almost incomparable beauty, whose magnificent trees are the product of centuries. Airy bridges, tropical plants, vines and flowers and noble groups of statuary will contribute to the charm of this section of the grounds, which comprise altogether over 250 acres. "A typical Southern motif has been given primary importance throughout," says Chief Architect Bradford L. Gilbert, "something never attempted before on so large a scale, and for this very reason no comparison can be made, nor is desired, with any other Exposition, and we expect to hold our own in an original and untried field."

The principal Exposition building, of which, of course, the Cotton Palace, or Textile Building, is chief, will be grouped around a plaza 1,200 x 900 feet, whose centre will be a sunken garden with sloping terraces of verdant green, with continuous arbors along its paths covered by jasmine, honeysuckle, trumpet vines, myrtle and Cherokee roses, with tropical vines arranged so as to show continuous bloom and give forth sweet fragrance. Commerce, and Liberal Arts, Agriculture, Machinery and Transportation exhibits will all be nobly and appropriately housed. The lower half of the Minerals and Forestry Building is to be constructed of minerals; the superstructure of Southern woods. The Arts and Fisheries Buildings will be in the park section, where already stands a lovely, mellow old "homestead," to be used as the Woman's Building. The Negro Building is expected to carry out the style of some famous Southern home surrounded by negro quarters, the whole to show the negro's progress in the last twenty-five years. This department is in charge of Booker T. Washington. Mr. Gilbert wishes the Government Building to be a replica of the White House; the various buildings along the Avenue of States and Cities to each reproduce some beautiful, historic or characteristic edifice of the State or city erecting it, as, for instance, Mount Vernon for Virginia; Sunnyside (Washington Irving's home), for New York, and so on.

ture. As a cotton and cereal producer occupies a notable position; her undeveloped resources are extensive; the successful experiments in the State's culture have been made there; Charles-is the last banishing centre of the South Atlantic, largest manufacturing centre, commerce, fertilizers, the world's port of call, a station for traffic with the West Indies, Cuba and Porto Rico particularly. Hence need not be imagined for an instant the utilitarian side of this Fair is to be left out of sight in æsthetic and antiquarian features; tempting as the city's extraordinary advantages are in this respect, they must be made to minister to practical values which will attract multitudes of business men to her beautiful, hospitable shores when her Exposition gates shall swing open next winter.

Concessions for space are being rapidly applied for, Mexican as well as West Indian exhibitors wishing opportunity to place their wares and products in competitive display. The Manager of Exhibits and Concessions is Mr. E. Tessier, Jr.; the President of the Exposition Company is Capt. W. Wagener, the Director-General Col. John H. Averill. The grounds are situated on the eastern bank of the Ashley River, within a mile and a half of the business centre of Charleston and easily accessible by electric and steam railways, or by boat, the river affording anchorage for the largest vessels. The Exposition Company was only organized last spring, the cornerstone only laid December 11; the work is being pushed forward with an enthusiasm which promises to produce splendid results.

"THE COTTON PALACE" AT THE COMING INTER-STATE EXPOSITION

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Queen Victoria's Obsequies

ONE who witnessed the marvelous pageantry with which the body of Queen Victoria, the well-beloved, was carried to its last resting-place, will ever forget the impressive scene. The journey had six stages: first from the castle in which the Queen died, to the shore of the Isle of Wight; second, by water to Portsmouth; thence by train to London; fourth, through the streets of London to Paddington railroad station; fifth, by train to Windsor; and sixth, from the railroad station at Windsor to the castle. Each stage had a solemnity and grandeur peculiarly its own. In the arrangements, a manifest effort had been made to make the melancholy ceremony truly representative of the grief of the royal family, of the army and navy, and of every class of the people.

The imposing obsequies commenced on Friday, Feb. 1. There was a brief service conducted by the Bishop of Winchester in the room in which the coffin had been placed. A company of Highlanders then bore it to a gun-carriage waiting at the doors, and it was placed thereon. It was covered with a pall of ivory satin, on which a cross had been embroidered in gold in the centre and the royal arms in gold all around the border. Upon it, resting on purple velvet cushions, were the royal crown, the gold jeweled sceptre and the orb, the insignia of royalty. Eight cream-colored horses drew the carriage at a walk. Following it came the King, beheaded, accompanied by Emperor William of Germany and the Queen's youngest surviving son, the Duke of Connaught, all on foot. Other royal personages followed, and then came the most pathetic scene of all, the present Queen with her daughters, daughter-in-law and her sisters-in-law, the late Queen's daughters. They were clad in ordinary black dresses, with black veils reaching to their feet. They were weeping bitterly, and it seemed doubtful to the spectators whether they would be able to complete the journey. But they walked on, a sad, sorrowful company of ten faithful women, trudging over the muddy road to the shore where the late Queen's yacht was anchored. The sailors of the yacht carried the body on board and placed it on the bier, which had been erected near the favorite place where the Queen used to sit on her sea voyages. The King and his relatives and guests went on board another yacht, and the second stage of the journey commenced. This was a royal pageant. England's greatest ironclads were moored in a double line, and through this avenue of monsters of naval warfare steamed the procession of the yachts bearing the body of the late Queen and the mourners. As the yacht carrying the body came abreast of each man-of-war in its turn, a salute was fired. The yachts dropped their anchors on reaching Portsmouth harbor, and were escorted by the foreign vessels which had been sent by almost every European power except Russia to do honor to the occasion. There they remained all night. On Saturday morning the body of the Queen was removed from the yacht to a broad car, and the King and his relatives and attendants entered the train. Along the eighty miles of its journey London the train passed through crowds of people clad in deep mourning, who stood on each side the track, thousands of them sobbing audibly as they witnessed the passing of their beloved monarch. On reaching London, the spectacle was most impressive. The Kings of Greece, Portugal and Belgium, and representatives of other sovereigns met the train. Everywhere tokens of mourning were visible; but the decorations, by the King's wish, were not of black, but of purple. Even the lamp-posts bore wreaths of flowers, the mute testimony of loving sorrow. The coffin was again placed on a gun carriage, the King and male relatives and royal guests following on horseback and the Queen and princesses in carriages. Dense, silent crowds, with tear-stained faces, lined the streets, and even in streets from which no view of the procession could be had, there were throngs of people clad in deep mourning. The crush was so dense that some were killed and others injured. So the body of the dead Monarch was carried to Paddington Station, where it was put on the train, and, followed by her weeping descendants, was taken to Windsor. The last stage of the journey, that from Windsor station to the castle, was marked by an incident that must have gratified many a sailor's heart. The horses drawing the gun-carriage on which the coffin had been placed, became restive. The King ordered them to be detached, and a company of sailors, proud of said that he did not wish his property to go to the heirs at law, for certain family reasons, but he postponed the making of a will which would dispose of it according to his wishes. For a full week before his death his lawyers were in attendance near his chamber, day and night, to take his instructions, but his physicians would not permit him to attend to any business. They said that in his feeble state the effort to make a will would prove fatal. He consequently died intestate. It may be hoped that he had not been similarly negligent about his spiritual interests. There are many who postpone making their peace with God until the last, forgetting, like this millionaire, that the last days may be days of such weakness that they can do nothing.

Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth while the evil days come not (Eccles. 12: 1).

Fences for Matrimony

The Legislature of Wisconsin is wrestling with the marriage problem in a truly heroic manner. Already it has adopted stringent precautions against ill-advised marriages, and now a bill has been introduced in the Senate which provides that no persons can marry who are suffering from true or hereditary insanity, insanity caused by vicious habits or the use of drugs, consumption, and various other diseases which are named in the bill. Every person who wishes to marry is required to go before an examining board of three surgeons, to be appointed in each county of the State by the county judge, and must pass an examination before a marriage license can be issued to them. In addition, all male candidates for matrimony who are under twenty-five years of age, and all female candidates under eighteen years must produce a written consent of their parents before they can secure a license. Any clergyman, Justice of the Peace, or other person who can perform marriages, and who marries any couples who do not produce a certificate from the examining physicians of his county is to be fined not more than $500 or confined in prison not more than one year. If this bill becomes a law, it may prevent evils which exist in all the States and in foreign lands. Perhaps, if it succeeds, these pioneers in the sphere of social reform may proceed to a still higher stage and reach the Apostolic standard, which in these days is strangely ignored:

Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers, for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? (II. Cor. 6: 14).

BRIEF NOTES

The new hymnal used by the Stundists of Russia contains translations of many hymns from the Moody and Sankey hymnal.

A large building at the Hague, formerly used as a palace, has been acquired for the use of the International Court of Arbitration organized by the Czar's Peace Conference. Already fourteen cases await the decision of the Court.

Dr. Griffith John, the veteran missionary in China, writes: "I do not take a desponding view of the future—quite the reverse. There are glorious days before us. Our prospects to-day are vastly brighter than they were six years ago."

Prof. A. H. Sayce reports that one fact mentioned in the Bible and vigorously contradicted by the sceptics, has been proved beyond the possibility of dispute by the inscriptions discovered at Susa and just deciphered. This is, that Elam was really as stated in Genesis 10, descended from Shem.

The Women's Missionary Society recently celebrated its fortieth anniversary in New York. Miss Deyo, one of the Society's missionaries in Japan, gave an account of the work in that land. Mrs. J. T. Gracey, formerly a missionary in India, described the beneficent work for the women of India done by the Society's missionaries there.

The Jesuit priest Don Jose Montana, who has been adviser and confessor to the Spanish royal family for twenty years past, has been dismissed from his office because of his bitter attacks on republicans and his hatred of popular government. the privilege, drew the carriage to the castle. The body was taken into St. George's Chapel, where the funeral service of the Church of England was read, prior to the last removal to the mausoleum at Frogmore, where the late Queen's dearly loved husband lies. Over the door of that beautiful edifice are the touching words that she caused to be placed there in the early days of her widowhood: "Farewell, beloved. Here at last I will rest with thee. With thee in Christ will I rise again." There, as she wished, her body will lie until her faith comes to realization. So ends the career of one whose devotion and purity of life all the world honors, a career worthy of the eulogium passed on the monarch whose death was mourned near three thousand years ago:

David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep (Acts. 13: 36).

Postponed too Long

A press dispatch from Richmond, Va., reports the death in that city of a millionaire of New York, who went there in the vain hope of recovering his health. His early years were full of hardships, but through the death of several relatives, who made him their heir, he became rich, and by judicious investments he increased his wealth until he possessed several million dollars. Some months ago his health began to fail, and though he was only fifty-two years of age it became evident that his life was nearing its close. The physicians advised him to spend the winter in the South, and he went to Richmond to try the effect of the change. He improved somewhat after his arrival, but had a relapse, from which he did not recover. He had made no will, though he had intimated his intention of doing so. It is

THE CARABAO, OR NATIVE BUFFALO, AND HIS MASTER

PLOUGHING WITH CARABAO IN THE PHILIPPINES

CHEERING news comes from our Gospel workers in the far-off Philippines. Mr. E. W. Hearne, of the Army and Navy Department International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Manila, giving interesting information as to the progress of the work generally. There are now about four thousand Filipinos attending the Protestant services held weekly in Manila and the adjacent villages. Over seven hundred natives have become members of the church at Manila, and at Iloilo, on the island of Panay, a spiritual work almost equal in extent and surpassing in results, has been developed. Many other points in the archipelago are ready for missionaries, and the people are clamoring for the Gospel. It is a field of great and marvelous possibilities, and the little handful of workers now there are greatly in need of spiritual reinforcements.

Some of the photographs forwarded by Mr. Hearne are exceedingly interesting. The large colored picture on the first page of this issue shows the pioneer Protestant Chapel and congregation in the Banio of Pandacan, a suburb of Manila. It was dedicated not long ago, and has already a good-sized membership. Some of the group standing in front of the chapel, which bears the legend, Capilla Metodista Episcopal de Pandacan (Methodist Episcopal Chapel of Pandacan), are members of the first Protestant Sunday School ever established in the Philippines. A unique photograph is that of a Protestant church which was erected by a native congregation at a cost of $25. It is a roomy structure of stout bamboo poles, with thatched roof and wooden flooring, and just big enough to comfortably accommodate the little audience which gathers there once a week to listen to the Gospel message.

Our other illustrations relate chiefly to the social and domestic side of native life in the archipelago. There the carabao, a type of buffalo, is the valued assistant of all who work outdoors, and especially on the plantations. There are a thousand and one duties which the carabao performs, besides the ploughing of soil and the hauling of wood and water. Two scenes of native life in San Mateo are full of picturesque interest, and the group

In his excellent work on the Philippines, Ramon Reyes Lala, himself a native of Manila, gives this descriptive sketch of the social life of his own people:

of native women of the same town shows many faces of unusual intelligence, the admixture of races being strongly marked, however. Primitive indeed is the method of operating the native saw-mill, as seen in another photograph, yet not more so probably than is the case with the same industry in interior China or South America.

Wages in the Philippines have no fixed standard. Skilled white labor is paid, at the different trades, from $1 to $2.50 per day, while native and Chinese labor is much cheaper. Up to the present time, the islands do not hold out any very decided attraction for skilled labor from the

Here the native is a petty king: for his own little domain, for nine months of the year, yields sufficient for his wants. Nature, indeed, gives him a golden harvest for only the reaping.

"After tiffin, each retires to his own room to enjoy the siesta; and thus we sleep undisturbed through the heavy afternoon hours."

Elsewhere, the writer pictures the archipelago as a botanist's paradise. He says: "The earth possesses no scenes more beautiful than those to be found in this radiant and blooming archipelago—from its northern to its southern verge, this magnificent rosary of glowing islands, that nature has hung above the heaving bosom of the warm Pacific. Of them all, none is more beautiful than Luzon, the largest and the richest of the whole, with its vast variety of attractive scenery, mountain and plain, lake and stream, everywhere clothed with glossy leafage, clustered growths of bamboo and palm, fields of yellow cane, and verdant coffee-groves. Everywhere is wealth of trees, clothing the mountains to their summits, and bordering the long green miles of ocean-shore. On a smaller scale, but not less beautiful than Luzon, are the many minor islands, such as Panay, Negros, Cebu, Samar, and others of names that would be strange to foreign ears. Here there are no stretches of barren lands, no drought-stricken shores, as in some of the deserts of the West, no flat and chalky fields like those of Barbadoes; and even the loveliest of the antilles must yield the

The scientist is sure to find his way there, and tell the world of the new and the strange in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms. With him will come the engineer, opening up roads right and left, laying a network of iron rails, where now only the buffalo-cart drags along, introducing the latest machinery for mining and farming industries, and starting a hum of activity in every quarter of the long-slumbering land. With these also will enter the practical economist, in search, not of the new, but of the useful, prospecting the forests for plants of economic value, seeking for new mines of coal and iron, tracing the gold placer-beds up to their mother-veins, seeking everywhere

The seas shall teem with ships carrying the products of the islands to foreign shores, and bringing back full cargoes to supply the demands of the islanders, commerce steadily growing in amount as civilization awakens the natives to the perception of new wants. Examples of a similar rejuvenation could easily be pointed out, and there is no conceivable reason why the Philippines should not be added to the list. These islands have been lavishly dealt with by nature; they have an industrious population; yet they have been allowed to remain for film of beauty to these charming isles of the eastern ocean. Here an abundant rainfall, an equitable climate, a rich soil, and the warm influences of the equatorial waters combine to yield a luxuriant beauty and variety of scenery that must be observed to be appreciated.

"Tropical scenery cannot be pictured in words. It must be seen to be comprehended. One need not, too, go beyond the environs of Manila—that Venice of the East, with its labyrinth of canals and estuaries—through which the tides of the broad bay daily ebb and flow—and with its wealth of brilliant flowers and tropic verdure—imagine oneself in a new world. Its surroundings are a dream of beauty.

"The bamboo never grows monotonous. It presents forms and colors of wonderful attractiveness and variety, and is fully dealt with as it been by the brush of the painter and the pen of the poet, that might well be given a fine-art gallery and a library of its own. In the depths of the forest, and along the streams, beautiful orchids abound; here clustered on stately trees so dense of growth that the sun's rays scarcely penetrate their foliage; here giving life and color to the ground, and of such odd and amazing forms, that one often seems looking rather upon towering birds and insects than upon plants. Here and there one finds oneself amid the spreading roots of the balete tree (Ficus Indica), from whose broad buttresses rises the mighty trunk, of such girth and even rotundity, that the natives make cart-wheels from sections of it. Down from the boughs, sixty feet in air, hang rope-like lianes, descending, like nature's cordage, to the ground, while to the trunks cling orchids and other foreign growths, until the entire great tree seems botanical world in itself."

This is the promise of the future which the native author outlines for his country: "Under new control I expect to see, in the twentieth century, a new destiny for this noble group of islands. Whether the people be given their freedom under the protection and influence of the United States, or the islands become a direct appanage of that or of some other enterprising nation of the West, a turn in the tide of Philippine affairs can hardly fail to set in, and the possibilities of the land be developed to an extent undreamed of under the effete rule of Spain. The seas shall teem with ships carrying the products of the islands to foreign shores, and bringing back full cargoes to supply the demands of the islanders, commerce steadily growing in amount as civilization awakens the natives to the perception of new wants. Examples of a similar rejuvenation could easily be pointed out, and there is no conceivable reason why the Philippines should not be added to the list. These islands have been lavishly dealt with by nature; they have an industrious population; yet they have been allowed to remain for centuries in a semi-savage industrial condition; they still await the touch of the magic hand of modern enterprise to arouse them from their state of decadence, and swing them into the tide of human progress. Under this influence prosperity and activity must come to them, as it has come to other lands, and those long-neglected and abused islands be made to 'bud and blossom like the rose.'

"Certainty of conviction and opinion, too, leads me to affirm that, with sanitary arrangements in all the cities, with hygienic living, and American enterprise, philanthropy, and valor in the islands, and free educational facilities eventually,—all will manifestly increase the morale of the islanders and develop a just appreciation of the natural beauties of their bounteous realm. All this will come with personal education, personal elevation; and without lessening the labor-producing quality of the native, or the outward physical radiation that constitutes his health and vigor. Health, like knowledge, will come to him in ever-widening circles, and nature, in full festival—as she is during the greater part of the Philippine year—will also appeal to him as she has never appealed before."

A late despatch from Manila fully confirms Mr. Hearne's statement of the remarkable success of the Protestant missionary work among the natives. Fully five thousand Filipinos in Manila and its suburbs have joined the Protestant churches. Mr. McLaughlin, a Methodist missionary, assisted by native preachers and volunteers from the soldiers, has held thirty meetings in one week. The new converts come from Malibay and Galatguin villages as well as from the capital, and some congregations, formerly Catholic, have come over practically en masse. The presidente of Malibay has turned over the former Catholic church for the use of the Methodists. Nicolas Zamorra, a Filipino convert, is being greatly used in this wonderful revival, and his efforts have been the means of bringing multitudes of natives into the new faith. In Cavite province and in central Luzon, Panay and Negros, the Presbyterians are making many converts.

AROUND THE WINTER FIRE

VICTORIA'S NOBLE LIFE

THE thought uppermost in the minds of most people just now is that of the long life spent in the blaze of publicity by England's noble Queen. The new King has been proclaimed in London according to mediæval custom, and loyal England has united in singing "God Save the King." All the same, England is very sorrowful, and there are tears in many hearts and eyes for the woman who shed so many tears herself over the cruel war in South Africa. For Queen Victoria more and more hated war and yearned for peace, and she was too old and too frail to endure the suspense, the tragedy, the bitterness and the bereavements of the fiercely waged conflict between Britain and Boer. The Queen's own personality from her youth up was gracious and kindly. She was a reverent Christian woman, who was actuated by high principle, who feared God and kept his commandments. History will keep her memory green.

From her babyhood to her old age, her life has been an open book, to be read of all, and, like her august consort, it may be said of her that she has shown "the white flower of a blameless life." Her court has been austere in its morality, her own strict integrity has never condoned vice, and her private life has been simple, womanly and gracious. A Queen with armies all over the world, and with wars continually waged in some portion of her territory, she has been an advocate of peace. Her personal friendships have been many, and she has never failed in saying the fit word of condolence to those who needed sympathy when they were in sorrow.

The loss of Queen Victoria affects the civilized world. In every land, in a thousand quiet homes, by cabin hearths as in castle halls, there are those who grieve that an illustrious reign has ended, and that a great and good woman, full of days and of honors, has been gathered to her fathers. It is her proud distinction to have given the name to an era; and the Victorian age in art, in science, in literature, and in the missionary impulse of the last half century, will always be remembered as splendid and glory-crowned. The reign of Victoria has been long and magnificent, and filled with great events and shining names. It has carried over into the new century, but it fitly belongs to the old, and its laurels will forever garland the nineteenth century.

Early Rising

Early rising is a virtuous performance, but the person who practices it must not look down on the neighbor who for any reason rises late. Old people and invalids and little children should sleep as long as they can in the morning.

Women and Municipal Affairs

An increasingly vital and intelligent interest in municipal affairs is characteristic of the modern woman. She brings to bear upon town housekeeping the capacity for arrangement and the nice attention to details which have become hers through generations of home management. In many of our cities, the women take upon themselves the burden of keeping the streets free from rubbish, of seeing that garbage is promptly removed, and of looking after the fringing ash-barrels which householders set against the kerbs. They go farther and lay out pretty triangles for grass and flowers, miniature parks for the city's adornment, and playgrounds for the city's children. Not often, fortunately, are the ladies called upon, as they did this autumn in a Pennsylvania town, en masse, with brooms pails and scrubbing-brushes, to give an object lesson in the way a street should be cleansed, but they do in various places so insist on decent purity, that even those who call them "pernickety," are grateful that women take a hand in making the town attractive and charming. Residential property rises in value wherever the women are interested as they should be in the town-housekeeping.

The Twilight and the Dawn

It is still so early in the new century that we can appropriately read this beautiful reverie of a much-prized contributor:

We stand at the funeral of years—in the twilight of a dying century. Invisible, intangible, hundred summers yet to be. No sin, no war, no sorrow, no broken hearts, no death!

But that foul monster, Sin, creeps apace with the march of Time. Each day finds it at his heels, and each night finds them camping together. A day at a time—a moment at a time—yet the history of a century is just what we make it.

The President's Flower

Some weeks ago, a little lad of seven went to the White House with his parents to pay a visit to our good President. Mr. McKinley lifted the little man on his lap and pinned in his button-hole a lovely pink carnation, which is Mr. McKinley's favorite flower. In years to come, that lad will remember with pride that one of America's greatest statesmen thus honored him, and that a great man was gracious to a little child.

Harsh Judgments

Judge not that ye be not judged. We seldom know every circumstance of an event, and we are therefore not able to judge fairly of our brother's temptations and trials. But we are human and imperfect ourselves, and liable to err, and we should therefore hesitate to express ourselves too strongly in condemnation of a friend. We may always condemn a sin.

"YOU ARE A LITTLE QUEEN," CRIED THE BEGGAR

inaudible, yet we know it is a something that is silently slipping out into the silent past. Nothing—but a space in the pyramid of the ages. Nothing—but a period in the cycle of time. Nothing—but a link in the circle of revolving years. Yet, something we are inclined to impersonate as a former friend. Ah! more than this—the kind father of us all.

Scarred veteran he was! Buffeted by storm; mangled by war; made gaunt by famine and fat by plenty; weeping over calamity and rejoicing at prosperity; looking into the graves of old generations and welcoming the birth of new ones, meeting out with impartial hand, to rich and poor alike.

Sometimes in his old age he seemed impetuous and rash—let us call it his second childhood and say nothing but good of the dead. But his work is done—the flame has flickered out, and we are sorry he is gone. He has drifted into the crowded past, and the tramp of marching millions beats his death-march, while we put him tenderly away to sleep with his fathers. He is already shrouded in mists, his bier is the sombre shadow of night's mid-hour, and we lay him, with a sense of regret, in the grave whence there is no resurrection.

But while we still stand looking out into the gloom, we feel the rosy blush of a new existence; we hear the joyous harbinger of a new birth-hour; and thus, crowned with the wee sma' hours of a new century, we stand in the amber dawn of a new age.

A hundred years of unmarred beauty! An Eden in all its purity! We fancy we see the unsullied snows of a hundred future winters; and we perceive the untainted fragrance of a

HALF-MAST THE FLAGS

Half-mast the flags on fort and fleet,
The mourners go about the street,
Oh, winds of winter, rough and sharp,
Play dirges on each vibrant harp.
And everywhere in home and heart,
Let sorrow have its place apart.
In grief for mother of her land,
Of Queen serene, in wise command.
The laurel on her tomb will rest,
As close to him her life loved best.
In death united they shall lie,
Beneath the steadfast, watching sky.
Half-mast the flags on tower and steep,
The world mourns with the good Queen people.

And white as drifted snow her name,
And long and lasting her great fame.

An Incident of Victoria's Childhood

QUEEN VICTORIA was the daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Kent, and the successor of King William IV., her father's brother. It is not uncommon for heart-burnings and jealousies to exist in royal families, and the next heir is not always lovingly regarded by the one on the throne. When the small Princess Victoria was a little girl playing with dolls, she lived with her parents in a comparatively simple home in Kensington, and the Kents were in quite limited circumstances, because King William had cut off his brother's allowances. So, the little girl had very little pocket-money, and she early began to learn the lessons of thrift which had never been her, making her when she died one of the world's richest women.

In a shop window, little Victoria saw and coveted a most beautiful doll. She often walked past the window to gaze at it. She told her governess what she would name the doll, and how it should be dressed when it became her property. But the day of possession loomed far away before the little royal maiden, for the doll's price was six shillings, and the six shillings had to be saved up a little at a time. Debt was not to be thought of though the shop people would gladly have trusted the daughter of the good Duchess of Kent.

At last a day came when the small princess held the six silver shillings, and a very happy child it was who went off to make her purchase. The doll was hers at last. Wrapped in silver paper, and tied with silver cord, tissue paper over that, and the box to hold it all ready, she hesitated, thought, and decided that she would let the wrappings go, and, like any other mother, carry her baby home in her own arms. It was an ecstatic moment.

As she was leaving the store, she suddenly saw a man, very poor and feeble and old, begging. Her tender heart was touched by his distress. How could she relieve it? She had now no money, and this man was ill-clad and hungry.

Running back into the shop, she asked the woman if she might leave the doll a little longer. The woman did not know her, but said, kindly, "Certainly, Miss," and returned the six shillings into the dimpled hand. Out ran the little girl and dropped her whole wealth into the beggar's palm. He was amazed, and cried "God bless you, my dear. You are a little queen." As indeed she was, in every sense. The generosity which was impulsive in childhood was restrained and tempered by discretion in maturity, but Victoria, to the very end of her long life and splendid reign, was kind to the poor and suffering, and loved to relieve distress.

Victoria's Deep Piety

The Queen was a devout member of the Church of England, but she was neither narrow nor bigoted. For the Non-Conformist churches she had large toleration and great respect, treating their ministers on public occasions when they approached her with distinguished courtesy. When one of her servants died, the Queen sent for the woman's pastor—a Congregational clergyman—and asked him to conduct a funeral service in a porch of Windsor Palace, and Her Majesty was present there among the mourners. In her book published many years ago, in which very intimate accounts of her daily life are given to her people, she speaks of being inexpressibly touched, when, in Scotland at Balmoral, Dr. Norman Macleod prayed for her and her children.

A BIBLE-CLASS TWELVE HUNDRED STRONG

FROM time to time, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has called attention to the widespread growth of Bible study and the earnest cooperation of Christian business men in religious work. It is an encouraging and hopeful sign of the tendency of the times toward the things that make for righteousness, when men who have been diligent in business, and who occupy honored places in the community, turn from the affairs of the world to God's Word, as the only source of real happiness in this life and that which is to come.

One of the largest classes for the study of the Bible is conducted in New York City by Mr. Charles H. Knox, a well-known lawyer and business man. For several years Mr. Knox has been President of the Municipal Civil Service Commission. Few busier men can be found anywhere, yet he devotes a large part of his time to spiritual work, and regards as his highest pleasure and privilege to labor for the Master. It is now nearly twenty-four years since a class was organized for the study of the International Sunday School Lesson in the Knox Memorial Church, Forty-first street, West of Ninth avenue, New York. This church, which was only recently been erected, is under the fostering care of the Fifth Avenue Reformed Church, of which the Rev. Donald Sage Mackay, D.D., is the pastor. This class has grown during the past few years to such an extent that the old edifice had to be enlarged six times to accommodate all the members.

Mr. Knox does not stop with simply teaching the Bible Lesson on the Lord's day. He sets his scholars to work in various religious and humanitarian fields. In this way he has been able, after many years, to train his class to great usefulness in the church, Sunday School, prayer meeting and different kinds of rescue work. He wants no drones around him. Those who attend the Bible class must work out its problems in helping others, and thus extending the Kingdom of God. Such a leader possesses a far-reaching influence for good over the lives of those with whom he comes in contact from Sunday to Sunday. In the early history of the class its growth was slow. Many discouragements arose, but little obstacles were not allowed to stand in the way. The class has gradually grown from a couple of dozen to twelve hundred, the number of names at present on the roll. Both sexes are welcomed every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

as they take their seats. This greeting has been one of the features of the work which has greatly contributed to its success. When persons come to the leader with their troubles, he gives kindly advice from a Christian standpoint, and the inquirers rely implicitly on what he says, and usually follow his counsel.

Another attractive feature of the class is the excellent music. From twenty to has long since solved this knotty problem. He holds his young people, from year to year, with unabated interest; indeed, he has some scholars at present in the class who have been there from twelve to eighteen years. He holds them because they love him, and no sooner are they enrolled than they go out and bring in other new members. Thus their numbers increase continually. Being a lifelong student of the Scriptures, their leader can teach them in the most effective manner. He comes from a long line of Bible students, his paternal grandfather, Rev. John Knox, D.D., a famous Bible scholar, having been for many years pastor of the Collegiate Church, New York.

Not the least among the various agencies that have made this Bible class one of the largest and most important in the city is the bright, cheery and earnest co-operation of Mrs. Knox. She welcomes the women, takes them cordially by the hand, sympathizes with those in trouble, and encourages the downcast. Her self-denying, loving service has been highly appreciated by her own church and the entire neighborhood.

Mr. Knox, while discussing the lesson, holds the attention of each person in the class. He uses every opportunity to press home upon them the truth of the Gospel, and especially the transcendent sacrifice of Christ for lost sinners. With such an ending in the teaching of a Sunday School lesson only the best results can come. His teaching has been richly blessed, and under it many souls have been led into the peace of salvation.

It is said that one-fourth of the members of the class belong to the Reformed Church. The rest includes Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Lutherans, and others, even Catholics and Hebrews. They come from all parts of Greater New York, and from Jersey City, Newark, Hoboken and Guttenberg. Among them is a large band of young men, earnest, wide-awake and devoted to the cause of Christ, who are now being trained for Christian work in the churches and missions of the metropolis.

MR. KNOX'S BIBLE CLASS OF TWELVE HUNDRED STUDENTS OF ALL DENOMINATIONS

The class organization and the management will repay the closest study and the earnest consideration of all Christian workers who aspire to usefulness in the Sunday School. It is hardly necessary to say that the leader is personally acquainted with every member of his class, and can call each one by name. One hour before the opening, Mr. and Mrs. Knox are on hand to greet strangers and to welcome the members of the class thirty minutes are spent in singing, the voices being often supplemented by cornet, violin, bass violin and other instruments. This is greatly appreciated by old and young.

It has been a serious problem with many pastors of churches and leaders of Sunday Schools how they might hold the young men and women, from fifteen to twenty years of age, who think they have outgrown the Sunday School. Mr. Knox

"We have been taking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for two years. It is a welcome visitor in our home, and we cannot praise it too highly. We have been greatly benefited by reading it. We also return thanks to you for your calendar for the year 1901."

Seaver Brothers, Oard Spring, Ind.

"I want to thank you sincerely for such a splendid premium. I should wonder how you could give so much for so little. The book I want among the choicest of my literary treasures, and the calendar, which is a beautiful work of art, looks sweetly bright and pretty in my parlor wall. As for the dear, good CHRISTIAN HERALD, I am so pleased with it and thankful for it, I can hardly express my gratitude for such a weekly visitor for a whole year. I believe my son was inspired when he selected such a gift. May the HERALD be blessed in its mission. I know it will be true to its name."

NEW YORK'S NEW PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE NEW METROPOLITAN LIBRARY AS IT WILL APPEAR WHEN FINISHED

Plans have at last been accepted for the great New York Public Library building, in which three of the largest present libraries of the city will be consolidated. These libraries are the Astor, Lenox, and the New York Free Circulating Library. In these will also be merged the Tilden Library fund, thus making practically four libraries in one. The plans are by Messrs. Carrere & Hastings, New York, architects. The building itself will surpass the beauty revealed in the drawing; indeed, in point of beauty it will equal the Congressional Library at Washington. The structure will be three hundred and ninety feet, or nearly two blocks long, and two hundred and sixty-nine feet wide, with shelving capacity for one million five hundred thousand volumes, and desk room for eight hundred readers in the main reading room. The new library will stand on the site of the old reservoir at Fifth avenue and Forty-second street, but it will be at least three years before the building will be completed and open to the public. Although for some years the actual number of volumes will not exceed one million, yet the circulating capacity during a given year will amount to twenty-five million. The building alone will cost two million dollars. The ground on which it is to stand is worth three million dollars. The books and furnishings will amount to three million dollars more.

Friendly Appreciation

"How glad we, old folks, are for the weekly visits of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: Our children are all grown up, and when we visit them and see that they are taking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we feel that they are on the line for prosperity. When we can induce neighbors to take it, we realize that they are better neighbors."

J. C. F., Austin, Tex.

"I received THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premium book, entitled 'Masterpieces of American Eloquence,' and am delighted with it. The half-tone of Lincoln on the first page is the best I have ever seen. It would be well for this generation if they possessed more of the sterling qualities of 'Honest Old Abe.'"

C. A. B., Woodstock, Ont., Can.

"The Masterpieces of American Eloquence" I deem a masterly production. Would that it could be placed in the hands of all the youth of our land, or of the civilized world. Every young mind, like virgin soil, contains seeds, or germs of thought, which, by proper culture, may produce grand results.

You cannot tell how grand a tree
Shall slowly grow, from that small seed,
That you have placed with hands so free;
Nor tell what hopes your words will breed,
Within the budding youths you see.

THE ADVANTAGES OF BEING A COUNTRY BOY.

A Helpful Symposium on a Subject which has Peculiar Interest for a Great many Readers of "The Christian Herald"

AS the boy who is country born and country bred any advantages over the city boy? Are there any real compensations for the loss of those opportunities of culture and development which are supposed to be peculiar to city life? Has the boy raised on the farm no substantial consolations? Does he enjoy no special and exclusive opportunities which do not fall to the lot of the city boy? This is the subject which has held the attention of the group of distinguished contributors whose views, prepared especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, are given below:

He Faces Real Life

DAVID STARR JORDAN, PRESIDENT OF LELAND STANFORD, JR., UNIVERSITY, PALO ALTO, CAL.

THE first advantage of a country boy is that he has grown up face to face with realities, and knows that there are such things and how to master them. I value no part of my own education more than what I learned on a farm. Not that I want to do any of those things now, but that the habit of meeting things squarely and doing them was a vital part of my education. The horizon of the farm is narrow, but that is good for a boy. It leads him to see clearly. To get face to face with nature and action, is the purpose of the "nature study" and "manual training" which in the city schools imperfectly take the place of farm life and farm work.

Minor advantages of the farm are its health and freedom, the absence of wasteful leisure, and the certainty of mastery over the horse; a thing without which no man should be turned loose in the world as educated. But, first of all, I place the contact with realities and the need of the country boy to meet and master them for himself.

A Life Homeric

BY CHARLES F. THWING, D.D., LL.D., PRESIDENT OF ADELBERT COLLEGE AND WESTERN RESERVE UNIVERSITY, CLEVELAND, O.

AMONG the chief advantages of being a country boy are the advantages of simplicity of life and of freedom of conduct. In a simple life the boy eats plain food, wears plain clothes, sits on plain chairs, sleeps in a plain bed-room, and associates with plain people. He is free from luxuriant living and elaborate conditions. He knows nothing of the splendor which man makes. The necessities are brought to his home every day and the natural means of filling them are present. His life is quite Homeric. He waits on himself. If he wants anything done, he does it himself. He earns the little spending money which he has, and often transmutes that little spending money into money saved. He comes close to nature in his moods of rest and reflection and he works hand in hand with nature in his every endeavor. He is content with little, or rather his little he converts into much. Such a life and condition help to make a man who emphasizes the realities of character and who is able to put proper values on all the elements which go to the constituting of the great world of humanity.

A second advantage is the advantage of freedom of conduct. How free is the country boy! The fields and the forest are his playgrounds, the ponds his race-course; the trout brooks his private preserve. The steers and the colts are his co-workers, and all the children of the neighborhood are his playmates. His nursery is the mows and the bays of the barn, and the wood-shed, which unites the house and the and closer too." The townsman's business leads him to deal chiefly with secondary causes. His own human shrewdness and skill are the things he constantly depends on for success; so that he comes finally to feel as if all his own comfort and happiness depended on himself. In the markets and in his office, he handles by the wholesale all the great natural food products, clothing, and the materials of wood and stone out of which houses are build-ed. They all mean to him only so many thousands of dollars. In his business mind and processes God is left out of the account altogether. Of course, if he were to stop and think back a little, he would see that he could not put even a bite of bread into his own mouth unless God had first caused the seed to spring and the wheat and corn to grow. He couldn't and he does not have to go through long, roundabout process of reasoning get to the right conclusion.

The farmer's Sunday, if he is a religious man at all, is a better Sunday than the city man's. It is more completely the Lord's day. In the city even on Sunday the business houses, if they are not open are still forever before your eyes, suggesting man's business and not "the Father business." Streets are crowded with people; street cars and railroad trains are running; saloons and theatres and dance halls and billiard halls are wide open base-ball or foot-ball games, horse races and prize fights go on; men must have their Sunday business letters. No wonder the city man has to fight hard to keep his religion, and, above all, the Lord's day as he ought to. But the farmer, even the most worldly, seldom thinks of working on Sunday, after the necessary chores are done. Other things will let him alone; he will let them alone. He can go to church if he wants to. And when he gets there, he hears a simple sermon which he can understand, takes part in a simple worship which he can follow, meets on familiar friends and neighbors instead of a lot of utter strangers, gets some good out of the service; and if he has to talk a bit outside, after church, it is still about weather and crops and stock with which God has still something to do.

Thank God, then, if you are a Christian at all, that you are also a farmer, and have about you all the time these constant appeals to your religious sensibility. That makes it all the easier for you to be a Christian and to stay one.

Strong Willed and Reliant

BY THE LATE JAMES S. MOUNT, GOVERNOR OF INDIANA.

THERE are prerequisites essential to a useful and successful life. Prominent among these is early training to habits of industry, frugality, economy and temperance. Coupled with these and of no less importance, are the environments that develop individuality, independence of thought and action, self-reliance, courage, originality, will-power and a strong body. It has been well said "The man without self-confidence and a strong will, is the plaything of chance, the puppet of his environments, the slave of circumstances. With these he is king, ever master of the situation." The country preeminently offers the best opportunities for this needful training. Remote from associations of evil and from surroundings that are conducive to dissipation and prodigality, the country boy is less liable to be enticed into sin.

While General Grant, a poor country lad, was breaking wild colts, and while below his teens, he was sent to the wood barn, is his trotting park. He is not "cribbed, cabined or confined." His horizon is not a sky-line made by rows of brick blocks. He sees the sun rising above the great valleys and he sees it set behind the everlasting hills. His world is a big world and in it he is free to come and to go.

Face to Face With God

RT.-REV. BOYD VINCENT, P. E. BISHOP; SO. OHIO

THE dweller in the country is brought more constantly face to face with God in nature than the dweller in town can ever be. "In the cities," said Sydney Smith, "all is man's work apparently—we see only Cæsar and his power. In the country God's hand is seen oftener put a coat on his back or that of his children if God had not first created the sheep with the wool on its back. He couldn't put shoes on his feet except for the hide of the cattle; nor build his house unless God had first provided the forests and the stone quarries. So with all the philosophies and sciences with which the city dweller is so much occupied.

The dweller in the country, if he is a thoughtful and earnest man at all, is a devoutly religious man. He lives face to face with God in God's direct work in nature. He sees God as the primary cause of all those things which sustain human and animal life and which make the world beautiful. All these facts appeal directly to his own primary instincts of truth; they go to his heart as well as his head;

th wagon and team and chain to load heavy timbers, a task requiring all the strength and genius of a man, he was forced to rely upon himself. Necessity was the mother of the resourcefulness developed in young Grant that enabled him to accomplish this marvelous feat. It was by such conditions in country life, and not at West Point, that forces were put in motion that made General Grant the hero of Vicksburg, culminating in the crowning honor of Appomattox. While Abraham Lincoln, the ill-clad, unpromising boy of poverty, in the obscurity of the log-cabin, where he climbed to his bed of leaves in the loft of means of wooden pins in the logs, who could have been jeered by the boy of fortune, he was there learning the great lesson of sympathy for the plain people, and the self-reliance that fitted him in subsequent years to become the trusted leader who piloted the nation through the dark night of peril, and to break the shackles that bound a race in thralldom. While returning recently with a company of gentlemen from the grave of the other of Abraham Lincoln, and discussing the advantages of country life to the city, a prominent business man of Indianapolis said he pitied the boy who did not enjoy the advantages of country life. I would that the country boy could know and appreciate his advantages. Personal experience intensifies my interest in the country boy. Having experienced myself the privations and hard work of the country boy, never having a penny to spend that I did not earn, and but few hours that I could appropriate for that purpose, that I deemed a hardship then, in the light of experience I now view as a blessing, for in this school of economy and patient drudgery I was obtaining the needed education to success. These environments did not abate my enthusiasm, but only tended to increase energy. I was learning self-reliance and will-power, and I knew unaided I must fight the battle of life. Under such tutorage, obstacles became stepping-stones to higher levels. In conclusion, a word to country boys. Don't grow weary of your lot; a change in the gaiety of the city will be worse for you. Patient toil is the road to true success. Be industrious, be economical, be hopeful; aim high; don't chew or smoke, drink intoxicants; stand for nobility of character, and you will win honor and success. A student of nature working in harmony with the God of nature. The farmer's life is the sweetest, the farthest removed from the turmoils of strife, and the nearest to God of any vocation. I rejoice in the anticipation of the restful quiet of my country home when I shall be permitted to lay aside public duties, cares and responsibilities, and return to the home which represents long years of toil and hopeful struggle.

Sound Mind in Sound Body

BY HON. JOHN WANAMAKER

IT is an undeniable fact that the boy in the country possesses advantages not open to the youth growing up in our great cities. The lad whose introduction to the busy world about him occurs amid rural surroundings, finds his horizon not limited by the countless structures of God's goodness to man as exemplified in his works through bounteous nature. The country boy has abundant evidence that among the honored men of the nation, many have had the advantage of a youth spent amid the green fields and pleasant surroundings of a country life.

The many benefits of a health-giving atmosphere and wholesome food are advantages the country boy possesses in excess of the boy in the city. Combined with these, regular hours of sleep and rest serve to perpetuate the "sound mind in a sound body," so necessary for those who would attain the highest measure of usefulness in this busy world.

Free from the temptations which beset the city youth on every side, luring him on to dissipation and ruin, the country boy finds his joy and recreation in rational amusements, which leave no aftermath of vain regret. Thus he prepares the foundation of a vigorous constitution and good health on which to build his life.

Natural Life Means Health

BY JESSIE A. FOWLER, SCIENTIST, NEW YORK

THE country boy has a much better chance to make his way in the world if he is brought up surrounded by the country fields, the woody glens and the river side. He has a chance, and a better chance, than the city boy to develop his lung powers, and his circulation is increased, his sleep is sounder, his opportunities to live a natural life are greater, and he is not surrounded by the same temptations that multiply about the city lad.

He is brought up largely upon eggs, milk, grains, fruit and vegetables, and consequently has a much better physique and a more enduring constitution and more robust health to start the battle of life than the city lad. The latter is surrounded by evening excitement, late hours, social enticements, evening studies and irregular and unsound sleep. The atmosphere is often too hot or too cold for health, and generally less pure than that enjoyed by the country lad. The diet of the city boy is largely made up of highly seasoned and rich food, of meats that are stimulating, of sweets that are clogging to the system, and often stimulants in the form of tea, coffee, and unfortunately beer and wines are added to the list, while in a social way the city lad is allowed to smoke, and sees the example set him by hundreds of other lads who contract the same habit. Thus, taking him all in all, the country lad has a better start in life than the city lad, although on first examination of the subject one would think that the city lad had more opportunities to develop his intellect. Even if this is the case, he has not such a fine preparation from a physical standpoint as his brother in the country. By using the brain too early in life we simply unfit it for its grand performance of mental duties in after life. There must, therefore, be a proper preparation for the years of intense mental labor that are to follow, hence the physical constitution calls for and demands healthy surroundings to start with.

CELEBRATING ITS 175th ANNIVERSARY

A Memorable Event in the History of the Venerable Congregational Church of Ridgebury, Conn.

FEW churches in the United States can claim to be as old as the venerable Congregational Church at Ridgebury, Conn., which recently celebrated its one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary. This parish was established in 1715, the first church built in 1725, and incorporated in 1761; the second church built in 1768, and it became Congregational in 1769; the manse was bought in 1832; a parsonage built in 1844, and the present church built in 1851. It has the distinction of being located nearer to the New York State line than any other church in Connecticut, the original parish lands including a strip—known as the Cong—one and three-quarter miles in width, "across the border."

Plain, austere, and almost Puritanical in its external simplicity, but cosy and genial within, and in summer almost hidden by the foliage of surrounding trees, stands the church—a long-time tower of strength for righteousness—and its parsonage—an ample and substantial residence—in which the old Dissenting (now Congregational) rural parish of Ridgebury lately honored its great age with a banquet and a series of sermons. Guests were present from New York, Boston, Hartford and other cities.

The pastor of the church is the Rev. William E. Todd, archaeologist and literature, a native of Connecticut. He is a prolific writer of biography, and on educational, archaeological, art and other topics, and has preached and lectured from 175 platforms and leading pulpits in the United States and Canada. His library contains, besides other rare works, over 25,000 biographies, and it is said that the scope of his work embraces forty-three nations. Dr. Todd has designed five churches, improved four, built three, and brought about the erection of two others. He has edited four periodicals, issued sixty publications, and many leading journals have published his works. He has traveled extensively, and has spoken frequently at national and international gatherings. He has been most successful as a pastor; and whenever he has left a church, it was after increasing its membership, and strengthening its finances as well. His archaeological researches have been exhaustive, and have given him a wide and enviable reputation. He has also been connected with three colleges, and is now making a careful collection of fine art from the work of the great masters.

The congregation of this historic church numbers among its supporters, educators, members of the town board, business men, members of the legislature, and retired metropolitan officers—all men of influence in the affairs of Western Connecticut. Throughout its long history, the church has received many tokens of the divine favor, and its work has been rich with spiritual blessing, and marked by many conversions. Under Mr. Todd's ministry, the church is taking a still deeper interest in spiritual work, and its activities have been greatly multiplied.

In an anniversary address, on "The Call of the Twentieth Century," given before the Men's Club by the pastor, Dr. Todd said in part: "Each century of the life of man has been accompanied by its own peculiar call to that portion of the race concerned as to the intent of existence in life and thought of our ever-increasing species. A Christian prince, Wilhelm, is cordially greeted by a Mohammedan sultan, and where mercy and peace have kissed each other he dedicated a church. China is pulling down her great wall—not an easy task. Japan is bending all her energies for everything modern; all American home governments are republics; the nations meet in Peace Conference at The Hague (a preliminary to a better day); and all the world powers are restraining injustice and reaching out protecting and welcoming hands to every land under the sun; enhancing, without much hesitancy, increasing responsibilities.

The twentieth century call will not be a call to ease, for nothing can be gained by inactivity. It will be a call to greater exercise of power for the general weal at home, locally and abroad. It is a call of futures—the kingdom of heaven is ever at hand, and we must cease contraction and expand every way and by all legitimate means.

GRANDMA BAXTER'S CABIN....

...How a Humble Log Hut on the Lonely Plains of Wyoming Became a Centre of Christian Influences...

BY W. H. SCHUREMAN, S. S. Missionary

WYOMING is named after the great Wyoming Valley in Pennsylvania and means "Large plains." In general appearance, it is a vast stretch of arid pasture or grazing land, covered in most part with a short, grayish-colored grass, very nutritious, upon which stock feeds the year round and fattens for market. The surface of the country is broken in some parts by low ranges of foothills, and traversed in every direction by deep ravines, often causing the traveler to take a very circuitous route to reach his destination. With the exception of a half-dozen cities, this sparse population is scattered far and wide in small villages, and up and down the water-courses, in ranch homes. Wyoming, by reason of its vast area of arid grazing lands, is now, and will continue for years to come, the home of the herdsman or ranchman.

W. H. SCHUREMAN

Traversing the State in every conceivable direction are well-defined public roads or "trails," as they are commonly called, the only obstruction being the ever-present barb wire fence. The writer has frequently been obliged to open twenty of these wire gates in a day's travel. Settlements are often far apart. You may not be aware of the fact that you are within a hundred miles of a habitation, when the turn of the road at the top of a hill brings you in full view of a substantial ranch home, nestled close in against a high bank of a stream, sheltered from the severe northwest winds by a friendly clump of cottonwoods. The hospitable ranchman receives you with a generous welcome, and when you announce yourself as a Sunday School missionary everything is at your disposal. The children are soon your fast friends, and an opportunity is given for imparting some practical, helpful truths. In two days the neighborhood is visited, a meeting announced for the organization of a Sabbath School, and for the first time in the history of the community, the people come together to study the Bible. These communities are limited in number and size by the water supply. Millions of acres of land will continue as a public domain for the reason that the homesteader has control of the water supply, and by this means is in possession of the pasturage for miles in every direction.

Education receives due attention everywhere, and the single isolated family is entitled to receive instruction at public expense. The writer knows of several instances where a public teacher is employed to instruct two children. Sometimes the equipment is very primitive. A little log house, or a box-car standing on a switch, answers for a school-house. These log school-houses soon become centres of social and intellectual influence for the community. To reach these isolated people with the Gospel is the problem the Sabbath School missionary is commissioned to solve.

Many of the children in these homes have grown up without having heard a sermon, unless, perchance, a minister has happened to spend a Sabbath in the Settlement. Sabbath School is, in some communities, an unheard of institution, and the question is sometimes asked by a boy or girl of fifteen years: "What do they do there?" The violent storms of wind and snow that prevail during several months in the year cause a timidity about leaving home, that renders it impossible to continue a Sabbath School more than five months out of the twelve. The rest of the year, these ranch children have little or no religious instruction. At one point, where the people are very widely scattered, a Home Department was organized, that meets at the end of each quarter to review the lessons, recite the Golden Text and make their offerings. This community has had no previous Christian training, and already excellent results are manifest.

In December, 1899, the writer started with horse and buggy to find the home of Grandma Baxter, in Southern Wyoming. It was a bitter cold afternoon, the wind whirling the snow along at the rate of sixty miles an hour. It was coming near night when the Twin Mountain School-house was passed on the trail, the children having already hurried across the open plains to their homes. The trail was soon covered with snow, and a wire-fence brought the missionary's faithful old horse to a standstill. It was now almost dark and no human habitation was anywhere in sight. But one thing remained to be done: find the way back to the school-house and camp there for the night. This was done as speedily as possible; but there was no supper for either the missionary or his horse. A shed furnished protection for the horse, and plenty of wood soon made a bright warm fire within. By the flickering fire-light some comforting passages of assurance were read from the old Book, and then the robes, cushions and coats were spread out on the floor for the night's repose.

Morning came at last, and a drive of four miles against a piercing north wind brought the missionary to the home of a hospitable ranchman who received him kindly. A few weeks afterward a second successful attempt was made to find the Baxter cabin, where a royal welcome was given by grandma, Max Rider, a grandson of twelve, and the school teacher. It had been snowing for several days, and grandma was out of wood and chicken-feed. Max had heard grandma asking the Lord for these things, and while he believed in grandma's faith, he wondered how the answer was to come. The missionary's appearance turned all thought away from the pressing need, and temporarily it was forgotten. The cabin consisted of two rooms, built of logs, with an old-fashioned fireplace in the end. When supper was over, the group gathered about the bright fire that was consuming the last of the logs grandma had managed to gather on the mountain side. There they sat, and listened as incident after incident of frontier life was related by grandma, showing her wonderful faith in God and his preserving care. Then came family prayer, in which all joined, and when Max had slipped away to bed, grandma told the others one more story.

"Max and his sister Nellie were left to my care when quite young. Nellie was naturally religious, and always said her prayers on retiring. Max was quite the opposite, and after listening to Nellie asking for 'daily bread' for several nights, he broke in with, 'Nellie, why do you ask for bread all the time? We've got lots of bread and two sacks of flour in the pantry. What we need, Nellie, is butter. Ask the Lord for butter, Nellie.' Nellie finally did so, and Max was satisfied and went to sleep."

It happened that a neighbor had learned somehow that Grandma was out of butter, and he came in that night with ten pounds. The next morning Max ran to Grandma as soon as he was up, and said:

"Has it come, Grandma?"

"What, Max?"

"Why, that butter Nellie prayed for last night."

"Yes, it came."

"Who did He send it by?"

"Our neighbor, James —."

"Well, Grandma, I'll always trust the Lord after this."

Before the missionary left, wood and chicken feed were supplied. A Testament and other good books were placed in Max's hands, and a promise was given to return.

The following summer, the missionary dropped in to see the inmates of the cabin home again, and found a new room added to the cabin that Grandma called "the prophet's room," into which the visitor was ushered and made to feel at home. Plans had already been made for a Sunday School to be organized in the cabin, with Grandma as superintendent. Thus, in that isolated community the good seed of the kingdom was sown in the hearts of those children of the plains, the harvest of which may be a hundredfold to the Master's honor and the joy of his servants.

Work of the Moody Bible Institute

At the recent annual meeting of the trustees of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, W. R. Moody, elder son and successor of D. L. Moody, was elected a trustee. The officers for the present year are: Vice-President, Fleming H. Revell; Treasurer, E. G. Keith, President of the Metropolitan National Bank of Chicago; Secretary, A. P. Fitt. The Secretary reported that the year that has just elapsed, the eleventh in the life of the Institute, has been the best in every respect that the Institute has known. The number of students enrolled during 1900 was four hundred and seventy-one. They represented thirty-eight States and Territories, eighteen foreign countries and forty-one religious denominations. Fifty-one old students were missionaries in China at the outbreak of the recent troubles. Of these, two were martyred, and five were in Pekin during the siege. The report of the Bible Institute Extension work showed that four teachers were engaged during 1900, who held one hundred and twelve conferences, in sixty-eight towns in eighteen States. The Colportage Association also reported a successful year. A new number was added to the Moody Colportage Library each month. The work pushed out beyond the shores of America, and large shipments were made for sale and distribution in India, Tasmania, South America, Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines and China. The circulation of the Colportage Library is now 3,815,148 copies.

Address MACBETH, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The past two years have been eventful ones for Binghamton, N. Y., but no incident of the many that have been brought to public attention is of greater human interest than that which centers about Ellen Parce, the wife of Mr. David F. Parce, of No. 4 Spruce St., of that city. So far as is known the story is now published for the first time.

The reporter found Mrs. Parce seated in an easy chair under the trees in the garden of her home. In reply to his questions Mrs. Parce said:

"It was two years ago this summer that I was in a miserable condition as the result of hard work. I was completely run down, pale and losing flesh, and so nervous that I could not sleep or even get rest. It was dreadful to go to bed at night all worn out and lie awake for hours with nervousness. If I did fall asleep it was to wake up in the morning as tired as when I went to bed.

"My head troubled me a great deal, too, both with pain and dizziness. If I stooped over at any time I would be so dizzy I could hardly see or keep from falling down. I was troubled somewhat with indigestion at this time, but the nervousness was the greater trouble. If I became a little excited my hands would shake so I could hardly hold anything in them. I felt that something must be done so I employed our best physicians. They did all they could for me and although I obtained some benefit from their treatment, not one of them did me any permanent good.

"I had, of course, read of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People but had never taken any of them till Mr. Robert Van Kuren, of Jordan, recommended them to me so strongly, from his own experience with them, that I got some and before the first box was used up I began to feel that they were doing me good. I kept on taking them according to directions and got from them the only real, permanent benefit I have had from any remedy. It did seem so good to get a night's sleep and to be refreshed by it. I am a firm believer in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and I have, and shall, recommend them to my friends. I generally keep a box in the house to take in case I feel a little run down. Signed, ELLEN PARCE.

OUR INDIA ORPHANS OF 1897

NOT ONE OF THOSE AT AHMEDNAGAR HAS DIED, AND ALL ARE MAKING GOOD PROGRESS

IT will be welcome news, to all who assisted in our India Relief Work in 1897, to learn from the following letter, how greatly that work has been blessed in the hands of our good missionaries:

"AHMEDNAGAR, INDIA, 3d, Jan. 1901.

"Dear Dr. Klopsch:—Please accept another expression of very hearty thanks for all you and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are doing for famine children. I acknowledge with thanks the tenth quarterly remittance of $75 toward the maintenance of orphans of the famine of 1897. With this money I have part of the expenses of a good many children who are not wholly dependent on me, some of whom live in the villages. But in Ahmednagar city I have had under my care twenty boys and fifteen girls, who were practically brought in at the time of the former famine.

"I have just looked over their record. Not one has died. Every one of the thirty-five is living and in good health. One boy has only one eye, and that is not strong, but he has been and is under medical care for the eye. All thirty-five have good characters. Of the twenty boys, five have rug-weaving for their occupation; six are studying to become teachers; two to become farmers; one to be a carpenter; one is acting as a messenger boy for me; four are keeping on with study; and one is working in his village. Eleven out of the twenty, entirely support themselves by work. Five more partly earn their living. Probably before we receive your twelfth remittance, not one boy out of the twenty will be supported by me, except the four who are studying in school.

"Out of the fifteen girls, five are working at rug-making. Most of these more than earn their living. The other girls are going to school. All are being trained in house-work. Three of the boys have been admitted into church as full members, and two of the girls. One boy is a dull, heavy boy. All the rest are bright, hopeful, good children.

"Allow me to quote from the last report of the mission what is a fair statement about the way in which famine children in our mission have been treated and how they are turning out: 'From the outset, these children have never been treated as orphans; they have been fed, clothed and cared for with as much consideration as if they had parents who were paying full fees for them. In consequence, self-respect and other sterling qualities are being developed in them. For children, they are unusually grateful, loyal and industrious. Brought as they were from wretched surroundings into helpful Christian influences, their minds and hearts have been peculiarly open to the reception of Christian truth. Many of them have given ample evidence of a change of heart, and the more mature among them have already confessed Christ.'

"Is not this a thoroughly satisfactory report as to how, by God's blessing, the famine children of the former famine have developed, who are under the Christian nurture of the American Marathi Mission of Western India?

"Again, please accept for yourself and for all friends our most grateful thanks. You know the Lord's words: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me.'

"To-day I added up the list of famine children and women of the famine of 1900 who are in the charge of the American Marathi Mission. The number is 2,853!

"To-day I received your kind cable-gram of congratulation upon the government of India conferring upon me the Kaiser-i Hind gold medal. Without doubt, this was meant as an expression of appreciation of American missionaries and Americans as a whole, for the very generous part which they have taken in famine relief. Everybody could not be named, and so they naturally pitched on one who has had official standing as Chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, and secretary of the Americo-Indian Relief Fund, and as a senior missionary who stood as a representative. But I have not done any more than many others to merit special mention, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, more than any other organization, really is entitled to the gold medal. I say this because it is a fact, and not out of courtesy to you. But neither you nor any of us have done anything except from the Christian desire to help our fellow-men physically and spiritually. Yours sincerely,

"R. A. HUME."

No More Aid Needed in Texas

IN response to an inquiry by the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whether further relief was needed in behalf of the Texas storm sufferers, Governor Sayers has forwarded this letter, to which we gladly give space:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATE OF TEXAS, }
AUSTIN, Jan. 28, 1901. }

LOUIS KLOPSCH, ESQ.,

My Dear Sir: Yours of the 23rd instant has just been received and contents noted. The Legislature of Texas is now in session, and will undoubtedly do all that may be necessary to extend what relief may be required for the storm sufferers on the Texas coast.

I thank you very much indeed for the evidence, as shown in your letter, of a desire to assist our people. Believe me, it is fully appreciated and will be gratefully remembered. Yours sincerely,

JOSEPH D. SAYERS, Governor.

Floral Tributes to Victoria

ABOUT the bier of England's dead Queen history, heraldry and philanthropy were writ in flowers. Never before for any monarch was there such wealth of floral tribute, nor had flowers such wondrous tales to tell of a whole world's love and reverence for the dead. From all nations they came, from Occident and Orient, from all classes of society—emperors, kings, queens, presidents of republics, authors, artists and laboring people. At the head of his mother's coffin, as she lay in state in the purple-draped Chapelle Ardente at Osborne, was King Edward's wreath, resting on a white satin cushion five feet six inches square, of orchids and lilies of the valley, with "Good and Beloved" in lettering of Parma violets. Beside it was an exquisite companion piece from Queen Alexandra; at the foot a beautiful floral crown from Princess Beatrice; on either side the magnificent wreaths of the Kaiser and Kaiserin. Other tributes from those of her blood found place with these close to the sacred clay of this royal mother and grandmother. But the Chapelle Ardente could not have held one-half of the world's "service of flowers" which set towards Osborne upon the announcement of Victoria's death. Offerings came in thousands, and St. George's Chapel overflowed with bloom and beauty. The King of Portugal sent a great crown of lilies on a cushion of violets; the King and Queen of Greece a replica of the royal arms made of Parma violets, white stock and mimosa from Crete, and a St. George's cross eight feet high of white lilacs; the Governor and officers of London Tower a shield outlining the tower in white stocks on violets; Queen Wilhelmina, a garland of lilies, violets and orchids. With these was Egypt's scarlet wreath, with crescent and star wrought in white; Brazil's laurel wreath, the number of the years of the Queen's widowhood woven into it in pink roses, of her widowhood, in purple orchids, all linked with a chain of spotless white camellias. China, through its embassy, sent a mighty wreath and a violet crown. Our President's offering, a wreath eight feet across, was of white camellias, lilies, lilacs, and roses, with mauve orchids in the centre. Ambassador Choate's cross of lilies of the valley was seven feet high. Mrs. Garfield, to whom in her bereavement the Queen had been most sympathetic and sisterly, sent a floral tribute bearing the inscription: "In grateful acknowledgment of the Queen's kindness to her." "In behalf of half a million temperance women," read the card on Lady Somerset's offering. The Institute of Journalists sent a seven-foot scroll of white flowers bearing a quill of scarlet bloom. A great wreath of lilies and camellias was Canada's token. With giant wreaths, and crowns and crosses and shields, were displayed humble posies from children, and tributes from many lowly ones. There was a harp made of shamrocks and violets, with broken strings, the card attached bearing the words: "From four poor Irish fishwives;" and a little wreath from a woman in a workhouse found honorable place.

COFFEE KNOCKED HIM.

Couldn't Move for 4 Hours After Drinking 2 Cups.

When coffee drinking affects a man's health so badly that he has to be put to bed for 4 hours after drinking 2 cups at dinner, it is high time he quit.

That was the experience of Mr. Hood, in Geneva, Mich. His wife writes: "I consider that Postum saved the life of my husband. For two years he had been troubled with his heart, and kept getting worse. I finally induced him to make the experiment of leaving off coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee, and he improved rapidly, but one day he drank two cups of strong coffee for dinner and had to lie on the bed four hours before he could move, since that time no coffee is used, but Postum altogether. He has entirely recovered his health, has no more trouble with his heart, and says he likes Postum better than he ever did like the old-fashioned coffee."

"A number of our neighbors use Postum altogether to the exclusion of ordinary coffee. Once in a while I find a person who has tried Postum and does not like it, but always find, upon inquiry, that they tried to make it by boiling it 5 or 10 minutes, which absolutely will not do. It must be boiled 15 or 20 minutes after the boiling begins. Put in a little piece of butter to prevent it from boiling over, and you will have a delicious, palatable, and nourishing beverage." A VETERAN AT REST

BRIEF mention was made in this journal last week of the death of Dr. Elias Riggs, the nonagenarian missionary of the American Board; we are now enabled to publish his portrait and some further facts about his life work.

Dr. Riggs was born at New Providence, N. J., Nov. 19, 1810. After acquiring the rudiments of education in public schools, he went to Amherst College. There his talents and extraordinary capacity for mastering foreign tongues attracted marked attention. A brilliant career in the classical and philological field was predicted for him, but the young student, who was only nineteen when he graduated, had chosen another sphere of labor. He had consecrated his talents and attainments to Christ, and after considering prayerfully the best way of using them most effectively, had decided on becoming a missionary. He therefore entered at Andover for three years of theological study. He then offered his services to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and was accepted. They sent him to Southeastern Europe, a field which is probably the most difficult in their list, inasmuch as it demands the highest culture, the greatest courage and the most intense devotion.

He settled first at Athens, to familiarize himself with the language of modern Greece and the dialects of Asia Minor and the Balkans. Thence he went to Smyrna, where he labored as a missionary for fifteen years. The works that came from his pen during that period, while he was actively engaged in preaching and teaching, proved that he was just the kind of worker most needed by a missionary society in this era of reading. He was accordingly removed to Constantinople, where printing facilities were better and where he was in touch with the publishing work. Three years later, having earned the right to a rest, he returned to this country to recuperate. But his was the kind of nature that takes rest only in change of occupation. At the invitation of Union Theological Seminary, he delivered a course of lectures on Oriental languages, which proved so useful that he was urged to abandon missionary work for the more comfortable and better paid labor of a professor's chair. Dr. Riggs, however, had other motives than ease and gain, and in 1858 he was again in his former field in the Turkish capital. After fifteen years of active missionary life, in which he labored unceasingly with tongue and pen, his services were demanded for a most congenial work. This was the translation of the Bible into Turkish, which was to be done at the joint cost of the American Bible Society and the British and Foreign Bible Society. Dr. Riggs had the assistance of eminent scholars, and in 1886 the great task was completed and revised. Besides this great work, Dr. Riggs prepared a grammar of Chaldee and several valuable text-books of Armenian and Bulgarian literature.

He also translated a large collection of Gospel hymns into Greek, Armenian and Bulgarian, and finally translated the whole Bible into Bulgarian. It is difficult to understand how one man could have done so much, but his heart was in his work, and he has made both the people who live in that section and all future missionaries who may labor among them his debtors. Perhaps no one man has ever done more to prepare the way for the evangelizing of the Balkans than he did by these labors. He was busy to the last, and when he finally laid down his pen at the age of ninety years, he was even then planning other works. An earnest, plodding, indefatigable servant of Christ, he must have received from the Master he had served so long and so faithfully a loving "Well done."

Educating the Natives in Samoa.

PRESIDENT Charles W. Eliot, of Harvard University, addressed the Secretary of the Navy in October last, stating that he had received a letter from an American in Samoa, to the effect that we were not taking pains to educate the natives. Assistant-secretary Hackett sent the correspondence to Commander Tilley, at the Naval Station, Tutuila, with direction to report upon the facts. The report from Commander Tilley, just received, is as follows:

"At the time that the United States assumed control of Tutuila, the only school then existing in the island was a school for native boys at Leone, conducted by the Rev. E. V. Cooper. Since that time a school for boys has been established at Manua and is now in full operation, having about one hundred boys. This school is under the control of a most able young native teacher, a graduate of Malua College. During the past six months, he, with the aid of his pupils and some other natives, has constructed his school buildings (six beautiful native houses), laid out his grounds, including a parade ground, and his school is now in full operation. There has also been established at Afao (near Leone), in Tutuila, within the past three months, a school for native girls, and this school, also, is now in full operation and has about a hundred pupils. It occupies temporary quarters at present, but the large new building, costing about ten thousand dollars, all subscribed by the natives, will soon be completed and they will move into it.

"The system of education here is to have in each village, a native teacher who has been educated in Malua. Through long years of experience with the natives, the missionaries have learned how to deal with them and they understand their natures much better than the casual visitor can. The natives, old and young, are like children, and must be taught by example rather than by too much precept. This is the plan of the missionary teaching: Simple truths are told to the children and then reiterated until they are ground in and bear fruit. The children live with the teachers in the schools, and by constant good example, many of them are taught to lead clean, good lives. I can conceive of no better system. Book knowledge will not be of much value to the present generation of native children in Samoa. The London Missionary Society is spending considerable money in educating the native children in the islands belonging to the United States."

A Feminine Anti-Vice Movement

A woman's anti-vice movement has been inaugurated in New York. The first meeting, January 31, was at the call of the Society for the Study of Life, and was opened by its President, Mrs. Almon Hensley, and then Mrs. Ella A. Boole, State President of the W. C. T. U., was made chairman. The meeting was a large and representative one, nearly every woman's organization in New York being present in the person of one or more delegates. Women doctors, nurses, students, Salvation Army officers, officers of the Jewish Women's Council, members of the Prison Reform Committee of the Society of Friends were there; in fact, almost every feminine phase of reform or philanthropy had place on the floor. A committee of nine was appointed to consider plans of work, and other meetings were arranged for.

A FRIEND OF THE BOWERY MISSION

ON a recent evening, a large crowd of men gathered in the Bowery Mission, for the purpose of listening to an evangelist hitherto unknown in metropolitan circles, but who appears destined in the future to occupy a prominent position in gospel work. Mr. W. H. Siglar, of Germantown, N. Y., for many years a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, naturally became interested in the work of the Bowery Mission, and, although busily engaged in commercial life, felt he would like to pay the famous old place a visit. He came and delivered a lecture on a subject often referred to there—the Prodigal Son. For upwards of an hour he held the attention of his great audience, and witnessed what he himself declared to be the most wonderful meeting he had ever addressed.

MR. W. H. SIGLAR

Mr. Siglar intends devoting a considerable portion of his time to this kind of work. He is a man just in the prime of life, thirty-nine years of age. He was educated in the public school of his native town, Gallatin, N. Y., and at the Claverack College, N. Y. For twelve years he was a school teacher, and all along has been an active worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In recent years, he has settled with his family on a beautiful fruit farm overlooking the Hudson at Germantown. It is from this rural home, after years of careful study and preparation, that, responding to the call of the Master, he is found ready to go out and minister to lost souls in the great cities. With an active body, an eloquent tongue, a loving heart, and with a glorious evangel on his lips, there seems to be a worthy future in store for this devoted servant of the Cross.

CANDIDATES FOR OUR HEROISM MEDAL

CORRESPONDENTS in many different parts of the country are now sending in the names of candidates for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's Medal for Heroism. Every effort is being made to announce in our first issue in March the name of the hero who will receive the medal for the most meritorious case of personal bravery in the first week in January.

As announced in previous issues, the proprietor of this journal purposes to award, once a week, a medal for the most meritorious case of personal bravery occurring during each week in the year. The first medal awarded will be for the most deserving act of heroism taking place in the first week of January, 1901. Every reader is invited to forward to us earliest information of any deed of true heroism occurring in his own locality. Send accounts only of thoroughly authentic cases, and tell the story from personal knowledge not from hearsay. A committee in New York meets once a week, and, on investigating the facts presented, decides which case is most deserving of recognition. This award is not for heroism in the line of paid professional duty, but for that which is absolutely voluntary and spontaneous, and without emolument. The medal is one of bronze, of elegant design. On one side is the inscription: "For Christ and Humanity. CHRISTIAN HERALD, N. Y.," and on the other side, "This medal was struck in commemoration of the heroism of . . . in saving life on . . . 1901."

In addition to this award, honorable public mention will also be made, weekly, of others who have distinguished themselves in an heroic way in the same period, and whose names, together with the story of their heroism, have been received.

Address all letters on this subject to Chairman, Medal Committee, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

An Afro-American Movement

A LARGE and enthusiastic Missionary Mass Meeting was held January 18th in Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church. Bethel Church is one of the most flourishing Afro-American churches in New York City. Rev. Dr. Cook is pastor. The occasion of the great gathering of people was a farewell to Bishop L. J. Coppin, who was to sail next day for Cape Town, South Africa, to take charge of the work of the Afro-American Church, which was begun there by Senior Bishop Turner, the first American bishop of his race to visit and organize a church in the Dark Continent. Bishop Grant, who began his education at Cookman Institute, Jacksonville, Florida, followed Bishop Turner, establishing missions and schools in different sections. There is a good Mission House and a flourishing school at Queenstown, Cape Colony, and native youths are being educated and trained up as missionaries of the Gospel.

Bishop Turner, who presided at the mass meeting, advises African emigration, and thinks this is what is needed for the great work of Christianizing and civilizing Africa. Bishop Gaines spoke commending Bishop Coffin's missionary zeal and his wife's self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of Christ, which impels her to encourage her husband to go to Africa while she remains here, discharging her duty to the industrial school, established in Philadelphia through her efforts. Bishop Salters, of Missouri, was followed by Rev. Dr. Johnson, of Washington, who said, among other things, "The keynote of the twentieth century is emancipation, freedom that comes from believing the truth."

Then Bishop Turner introduced Bishop L. J. Coppin, who, filled with the spirit of Christ, leaving home, wife and friends, to obey the Gospel call. Bishop Coffin, like Bishop Turner, advocates African emigration. Africa, he says, is the negroes own country, and proposed colored men and women in great numbers should be sent out from America to evangelize the Dark Continent. He prophesies that many students of the schools established by the Freedmen's Aid Society will hear and heed the divine call to go to Africa and preach the Gospel to the many tribes there who have never heard of Jesus. "We know," he said to the gathering at Bethel, "that white men cannot live long in that climate, but Afro-Americans can. Realizing the great possibilities opening to them in this far away land, many will go out and colonize, carrying with them all the benefits received in such manual schools as Booker T. Washington has organized at Tuskegee, Ala. Students, too, in our church schools in the South will hear the cry of Ethiopia, and will respond to the call, saying, 'Here am I; send me.' Give the Africans of this country the spelling book and the means of higher education, with the full benefits of Christian instruction, leading them to consecrate their hearts and lives to God, and then encourage them to be bearers of their own blessings to that great country beyond the sea, where the people are waiting to receive Divine truth. Loyalty and devotion to God must be the inspiration of this great movement."

HOW SHE FOUND CHRIST

Bessie Laythe Scovell, Pres. of Minnesota W. C. T. U., Tells of her Conversion

BESSIE SCOVELL was left an orphan when very young, and had almost no religious influence or training during her childhood. Yet her father had taught her, before she was three years of age, that little prayer which has been on all our lips, "Now I lay me down to sleep;" and though he then went away to heaven, and left to the little three-year-old girl only that single memory of him, it was not without its gracious influence on her young life. In a dumb, blind way, as childhood advanced, she asked God to teach her how to pray something more than the little lines that the Christian father had taught her in her babyhood. At thirteen years of age, she came under the influence of a Baptist revival, and in a little log school-house, far out assurance that she was an accepted and loved child of God. But, in 1885, there came a brighter day for her Christian life. As is often the case, the great joy came with a stormy front. She was in bitter sorrow through the loss of two friends. She was teaching a little country school, and there was preaching in the school-house by a man so dry that the bones of "the skeleton of the sermon" rattled. In March, she went up to Minneapolis for a few weeks' vacation, at a time when Rev. A. C. Williams, Pastor of the First M. E. Church, was earnestly leading his young people into a deeper Christian experience. A sermon that aroused many was from the text, "Woe unto you that are at ease in Zion." This text had been greatly blessed to the heart of one of Mrs. Scovell's friends, who came at once to call upon her. Glowing with the new joy that had come to her, she almost immediately asked Bessie if she was satisfied with her Christian experience.

"No," was the reply.

"Let's kneel right down and tell God about it, that you may have satisfaction in your Christian life," urged the friend.

She got up and closed the door, and they prayed. She received no light for several weeks, though she continued earnestly seeking. About this time, another of her young friends, who has since become an earnest Baptist minister, was converted, and became a very joyous Christian. With great earnestness, Mrs. Scovell sought of him to tell her just the steps he had gone through. At the close of the conversation, they having been talking about that promise, that where two or three are agreed as touching anything, it shall be granted, they agreed that at six o'clock each evening they would join in prayer, though in different parts of the city, that she might know that her sins were forgiven. The first evening there was no change, but the second evening, as she went up to a little attic room that she had used, day after day, in her agony, where she might be alone with God, there came a sweet peace to her soul. Light seemed to break in, and she went to the prayer-meeting that evening to tell the glad news. Her countenance showed it, too, and her friends greatly rejoiced with her in the glorious result of her seeking.

From that day on, Bessie Laythe Scovell has lived a life of shining Christianity. Her influence and work have been greatly blessed of God in temperance and Christian effort. And those who have looked on and have beheld her shining life, have had their thoughts lifted up to God, and have glorified him for the beauty of the Christian graces that have shone forth in her career.

The Mission Boat on the Orinoco

Missionary R. W. Crichton, the story of whose pioneer Gospel work in Venezuela appeared in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sends this note for publication:

"On account of an unlooked-for delay in the arrival of our mission boat, La Verdad, in New York, we were not able to ship it to-day as we informed you was our expectation and purpose. Though it has been a trying disappointment to us, we do not doubt the Lord has meant it for good. The delay may mean a couple of weeks or so longer for us here, but this will enable those newly interested in this work to pray for us in our going out, and so be partners with us. We trust many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will have a growing interest and be glad to hear from us from time to time through your columns of our progress and experiences.

BESSIE LAYTHE SCOVELL

of the frontier. The preacher was an earnest backwoods minister, and used to go so "warmed up" that he would take his coat and preach in his shirt-sleeves. It was good, honest preaching, however, and Brother Berry, or, as the young people called him, "Elder Berry," gave them that little school-house. Bessie was brought under conviction of sin, and became convinced that it was her duty to become a Christian. A number of her young friends were praying for her, and their sympathy and love touched her heart and led her, one day, after one of the earnest exhortations of the preacher, to stand up and ask for the prayers of Christian people.

She did not hear much preaching after that for some time, and had a pretty hard time to keep her face Zionward. She had, as she expressed it during those girlish years, "ups and downs—more downs than ups." It was not until ten years later, though she had been for several years a member of the church, that she was really consciously converted to Christ. Those were years of spiritual discomfort. It must be true that one of the weakest points in the modern Christian church is the sad fact, that in nearly every congregation of Christians throughout the country there are a great many people who want to be Christians, and whose desire for a Christian life has been so stirred up that they have joined the church, and are named among its members, but they have nothing of the joy of salvation, which is the real nerve and strength of the Christian. This it is that makes the church weak. It is like a great room where half the lights are dark because they have no oil. If you fill them all up, and light every one, the room glows with illumination. So it would be in our churches, if all the unlighted natures could suddenly be brought to a complete surrender to God, and begin to burn and shine as candles of the Lord. The glory that light would speedily win the world for Christ.

Bessie Scovell had been living for years the church, and yet had no comfort or joy as a Christian, because she had no

A Profitable Investment.

Jno. Blakely, of W. Lebanon, Pa., reports that he got more value from $1.00 worth of Grape-Nuts food than from $600 spent in noted hospitals, trying to get well from stomach trouble. He says: "After all my experience, I had to come home thinking there was no cure for me. I was so weak and nervous I could hardly walk, and for three years I hadn't a good night's sleep. I was run down until I only weighed 120 pounds."

"I commenced using Grape-Nuts about a year ago, and now I weigh 163 pounds and can do as good a day's work as any one. When I go to bed I sleep all night peacefully and am refreshed in the morning. I use Grape-Nuts food every day and know it is the greatest blessing that was ever sent to suffering humanity. I believe if it had not been for this food I would have been under the sod before this." There is a reason. No food in existence contains, in a concentrated form, the elements that will rebuild the nerve centers and the brain as Grape-Nuts, and the beauty of the food is that it is perfectly cooked at the factory and by the process of manufacture is predigested in a natural way therefore requires but trifling power of the stomach to digest it.

OVERTAKEN BY JUSTICE

The Slaughterers of the Missionaries in China are Terribly Punished :: :

LETTERS from Peking give details of the operations of the punitive expedition sent by the allies to Pao-tung-fu, the scene of the missionary massacres last summer. Swift and terrible was the justice that overtook the leaders in the massacres. The American troops declined to have a part in the work of vengeance, and the expedition set out without a single American participant. It consisted of 1,000 Germans, 1,300 British, 1,200 French and 300 Italians.

As on the march of the allies from Tientsin to Peking, a small village was encountered almost every mile. Some were entirely deserted, the people having fled in terror to the fields to hide, and some were still inhabited, the people standing in awe-stricken swarms in the streets or keeping to their houses.

Shortly after the arrival of the allies at Pao-tung-fu, a train from the south brought in Mr. Griffiths and Mr. Brown, the survivors of the missionary band of that region who had been kept some time at Chengting-fu. Miss Gregg and Mr. and Mrs. Green, of the China Inland Mission, were in the yamen of an official of Pao-tung-fu, receiving good care. The party had suffered terribly at the hands of the Chinese and were nearly exhausted. Mr. Green was almost dying from dysentery, caused by exposure and improper food. A Mandarin at Chengting-fu promised to send them to Tientsin, but after they had been taken a little way were set free. The forlorn little party pushed into the grain fields to hide and remained there for a day and a night, enduring discomforts during a rainstorm and living on grain. They finally managed to make their way down the river to a settlement. Here they fell again into the hands of Boxers, who dragged them to a place called Sin An, where they subjected them to tortures and compelled them to lie bound in a pool of stagnant water and mud. They were next taken to the yamen of the chief official, where Miss Gregg's head was placed on a stone, and apparent preparations were made to behead her. The Boxers went through the movements of a mock decapitation several times. Finally the party were brought back to Pao-tung-fu. From this time their troubles were practically ended.

The fact that the outrages committed at Pao-tung-fu took place four months before the arrival of the allies made it difficult to obtain a true account of the affair. Capt. Grote Hutchinson, of the Sixth United States Cavalry, after interviewing many persons at Pao-tung-fu, submitted a report on the fate of the missionaries, which is believed to be substantially correct, and which corroborates what has already been published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The temple where the missionaries were kept was blown up with dynamite by the allies. The gate towers of the city were destroyed, and that portion of the wall near the ground where the missionaries were executed was blown up. Various villages, where the Boxers had been conspicuous, were visited, and in some instances destroyed. Col. Thayer, with a detachment of Royal Bengal Lancers, went to Ku Sang, cut to pieces some twenty Chinese who fired on him, and burned down the village. British cavalry at I Cho and the Ching tombs gathered up, perhaps, a dozen Boxers and shot them after establishing their identity and guilt. The Germans, Italians and French also went out in various directions.

Gen. Richardson's column visited the village of Tung Wah Ying, where the Boxers had destroyed a Catholic chapel and driven out the converts. About ten Boxers were denounced by a Chinese Catholic. Gen. Richardson had them examined by two European interpreters and established the guilt of three, one of whom was a Boxer chief. These were shot. The others were liberated. The Boxer houses were destroyed.

A long march on October 31 brought the column to the town of Yung Tsing, where Messrs. Robinson and Norman, the Church of England missionaries, met their fate. Gen. Richardson demanded of the village 40,000 taels for the families of the murdered men, and a certain number of mules for the army transport. The next morning the Magistrate paid 4,000 taels down and gave acceptable security for the rest of the sum; forty mules were produced for the use of the army. In addition, Richardson caused to be blown up the city temple, the chief Boxer temple and the north gate of the city. He also sent out detachments to destroy the villages where Norman was tortured and killed. The three villages whose inhabitants led or egged on the attack against Admiral Seymour's expedition were burned, and two temples blown up with dynamite.

Chaplain Milburn's Blighted Hope

When Dr. W. H. Milburn, the blind Chaplain of the United States Senate, was in London, he consulted the leading oculists as to the possibility of regaining his sight. He was told that there was but one oculist, however, and that man Dr. Graef, of Berlin, who might effect a cure. He went to Paris to consult the French oculists. They concurred in the opinion that the only man who could treat him successfully was Dr. Graef, of Berlin, and congratulated him on the fact that Dr. Graef happened then to be in Paris, and so Dr. Milburn consulted him. The great German specialist said to the blind chaplain, "You must come to my hospital and remain there six weeks, before you receive the first part of the treatment." Dr. Milburn consented. He went to Berlin, and entered Dr. Graef's hospital. The oculist told him that he probably would find his sojourn very tiresome and tedious, and he would do well to advertise for somebody to read to him. Dr. Milburn advertised for an educated German woman who, for reasonable compensation and for the sake of Christ, would read to a blind chaplain. In response to this advertisement, Frl. von Forstner applied for the position. She happened to be peculiarly adapted to the requirements, being a niece of the famous theologian and preacher Schleiermacher. The day she was installed, Dr. Milburn asked her to take down Carlyle's "Frederick the Great," Vol. V., to turn to page 119, and begin to read to him. He was such a quiet listener that Frl. Forstner several times thought he was asleep, and finally she stopped, thinking that he was no longer listening. He roared, "Why do you stop? Why do you not proceed?" In response, she asked him the question, "Why did you get a German and not an English or an American lady to read from the English historian's works to you?" He replied, "What do English women know about Frederick the Great? I wanted to know all about him, and I knew that an educated German woman could tell me more on this subject than any English woman I know."

After six weeks, Dr. Graef made the initial operation, and was delighted with its success. He told the chaplain he would have to wait seven months before the next operation could take place, and in the meantime it would be just as well for him to return to America, where he would no doubt enjoy life more than in a strange country. Two months and a week after his return to this country, Chaplain Milburn was informed of the death of Dr. Graef. He could find no oculist who would undertake the delicate operation which Dr. Graef was willing to perform, and so, with the life of Dr. Graef, the chaplain's hopes of recovering his sight vanished.

THE VALLEY OF THE PAST

FROM this life-height we turn and linger Upon the vale of the past year, And see below us in the pathway Spots stained by evil and our fear.

But as we look a glow of sunlight Breaks on the shadow of the past, And in the pure and golden sunshine From heaven a soft rain falleth fast.

It washes all the spots sin-stained And from the heavenly purity Of upper sky a voice seems calling With words of cheer and sympathy,

"My child, go forward, still abiding In faith and hope and holy love, For lo, the Christ is with you always, With peace and comfort from above."

TRUSTING FOR STRENGTH :::

Divine Power Imparted by Christ for Life and Service

HOW unbounded was the confidence Paul had in the power of Christ! When all the circumstances are taken into account, it is astonishing that he should have had this confidence. It does not appear from the record that he ever met him, save in that mysterious way that changed the whole course of his life. "Last of all," he says, "he appeared to me also." As Paul was but twenty-four years old when Jesus first preached in Jerusalem, it is possible that he may have seen him in the flesh, though as he never refers to it, we may infer that it is not probable. But he had learned to reverence and love and trust in with the whole force of his strong nature. Perhaps no man who ever lived was more fiercely tested. To renounce all his most tender associations, all the glory and honor of the career opening before him, all his old friends, to brave persecution, poverty and hardship for Christ's sake, surely this was allegiance, wholehearted and intense. There must have been something in the revelation of Jesus to him that answered a deep need in his soul. He must have found in the Lord the element for which his nature had been craving. What if the chief thing was strength? It seems possible that it may have been. As we read the closing verses of the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, we behold the picture of a man hungering for power. Paul must have passed through that experience before he could describe it so vividly. The note of triumph with which the chapter closes indicates that he had found the source of strength.

The epistle to the Philippians was one of the latest epistles written near the close of Paul's life, and, in this, more explicitly, we have the same triumphant note. "I can do all things," he says, "through Christ who strengtheneth me." That is a very different report from the wail in the former passage, which describes his condition before he knew Christ. Now, as he says, he knows how to be abased and how to abound, a very difficult matter, as many who have tried one or other of the conditions can testify. And he has learned whatever state he is, therewith to be content. This also is a very rare attainment, which, if it were more common, would save the world much strife and heart-burning. So we have the man who formerly did what he did not want to do, and was unable to do the things that he did want to do, now able to do all things, even the most difficult. And the reason of the change? It has found that Christ strengthens him. How it is done he does not explain, but he is content with stating the fact. It agrees, however, with the definite promise that Christ made during his ministry. He was, he said, the Bread of Life, which would satisfy the soul of man, he was the water of life, which if any man drank, he would never thirst more, and at the very last, when every thing else failed, he was the resurrection and the life, by which a man, though he were dead, should come to life. Paul had found this power and had found it a fact. The divine life was really so imparted as to give strength to weak human nature, enabling it to live a life higher and better than its own. It was this experience, combined with his love of men, that sent him around the world proclaiming the secret of the remedy for human frailty. He wanted every man to know it so that the blessing might come to all.

And how has it been since Paul's day? Multitudes have tested this power and have received it in proportion to their faith. It is this which differentiates Christianity from all other religions. Its central element is not philosophy, nor a creed, but a Divine Person imparting power. "I am come," Christ said, "that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly." This is the supreme need of the world. When a man's lower animal nature clamors for indulgence; when temptation assails him; when his sordid environment depresses him, and the spirit sinks and becomes weak—then, instead of yielding, let him betake himself to the Strong for strength, and it will be given him. Christ does not promise to remove our enemies from us; he does not promise to make our way easy, nor our hardships light, but he promises that his grace shall be sufficient for us. The man who sits down at the foot of the mountain and prays that he may be lifted to its summit, receives no answer; but if he will pray that strength may be given him to climb, and show his faith by beginning to climb, he will receive his answer in power renewed at every step. So, when we long for a different situation where the trials will not be so bitter nor the temptations so strong, it is probable that we will be disappointed. But if we set ourselves to the task imposed upon us of living as Christians should in the uncongenial air, we receive help, and in due time, having learned the lesson Christ desires to teach, the discipline is ended, and he that has overcome receives the promised reward.

The Highest River in the World

THE Tsangpo, flowing in cloudland, at an elevation of 11,000 to 14,000 feet, for nearly 1,000 miles, is entitled to this distinction. It is not only the world's highest but the world's most remarkable river, says James Mascarene Hubbard in a recent issue of the National Geographic Magazine. It is a river of mystery, too, for part of its course is through the "Sealed Land" of Tibet, in the southwest corner of which it rises some 15,000 feet above sea-level, and receiving the drainage of the Himalayas and a parallel Tibetan range, soon becomes a navigable stream, accommodating considerable boat traffic at an elevation little below the summit of Mont Blanc. Passing close by Shassa, the "Forbidden City," it is later lost in Himalayan fastnesses, its course known only to savages. Mr. Hubbard says:

When last seen by an explorer, it is at a height of from 8,000 to 11,000 feet, but when it emerges in Assam, it is only 400 feet above sea-level. The imagination fails to grasp the reality, as there is no other instance on earth of a large river dropping 8,000 feet in 150 miles. Native testimony is conclusive to at least one awe-inspiring fall before Tibetan territory is left. Local lamas (priests) relate to awe-struck pilgrims that amid the thundering water stands a king-devil placed there under a spell. The ascent of the river from the plains of Assam has been absolutely prohibited hitherto by the Indian Government, on the ground that there is almost a certainty that the explorer would be killed. The Tsangpo has been explored, however, with the exception of this 150 miles, though not by white men.

The explorer of the Tsangpo, Nain Singh, a Hindu schoolmaster in a Himalayan village, dared untold perils and endured terrible hardships—a seven years' slavery in Tibet for one thing—in seeking to solve the mysteries of the Tsangpo, of which he made a route survey of 1,319 miles, 1,200 of which were through country never explored before. He entered the "Sealed Land" disguised as a Buddhist pilgrim, with tea-bowl and prayer-barrel suspended at his girdle and counting his rosary as he walked. The prayer-barrel contained instead of prayer-script, sextant, compass and other apparatus. He dropped a bead from his rosary for every hundred steps taken and so counted distance. He entered Shassa and had an interview with the Grand Lama, whom he described as a fair and handsome boy about thirteen years old, seated on a throne six feet high, two high priests holding peacock plumes above him. Few foreigners have looked upon the face of the Grand Lama, and returned to tell of it. Readers of this journal are familiar with the tortures Lander endured in his explorations of Tibet, and they are aware of the fact that Christian missionaries entering the "Sealed Land" are, as a rule, heard from no more. There are indications of a change of feeling on the part of Tibetan rulers toward the Indian Government, which may result in opening the door of the "Sealed Land" to foreigners; should this occur, the messengers of Christ may be able to carry light to many that sit in darkness.

Know What Your Dealer Pays

THIS BOOK CONTAINS 70,000 PRICES
17,000 PICTURES
1,200 PAGES

This book tells pretty nearly what your dealer pays for everything. It quotes wholesale prices on 70,000 articles, and shows pictures of 17,000 of them. It includes practically everything that anybody uses, wears or eats; and its prices are the lowest ever quoted. It will save the average family at least $100 per year—some $500. Two million people send for this book yearly as a buying guide, and we want you to have one, too.

For 29 Years we have been selling merchandise by mail at about what dealers pay. Ours is the original catalogue business, and the greatest mail order house in the world. This enormous business has been gained and held by underselling everybody, treating customers fairly, and doing as we agree.

Two Million People are now numbered among our customers. We carry for them a stock valued at $2,500,000. We employ 2,000 clerks to fill their orders. It requires 100 typewriters to write our letters to them.

You Need This Book because you can rely on it. Other catalogues are offered you, but this one is best. Our house is the oldest and largest, and our prices are always the lowest. Our guarantee is the fairest, and our record of a quarter century assures you of fair dealing. We keep our customers.

We Guarantee Satisfaction and safe delivery. Every article in our catalogue is described exactly as it is. Not the slightest exaggeration is ever permitted. But if anything you get doesn't suit you in quality, or price, or fit, send it back and we will replace it. Or we will send your money back, and pay transportation both ways. We consider no expense or effort too great to avoid having one dissatisfied customer.

Two Thousand Stores in One Two thousand average dealers together will not buy so much in a year as we. The makers who sell to us have no traveling expense, no credit risk, no losses, no salesmen to pay. They save the whole cost of selling the same goods to 2,000 separate stores, scattered everywhere. The fiercest competition in America centers in the effort to get our trade. The prices we pay are never much above cost; and goods that we cannot buy low enough are made in factories of our own. Is it any wonder that we can sell for about what common dealers pay? We get along with a fraction of the profit charged by stores. We have no salesmen—no selling expense save our catalogue. A dealer must make several times as much on each article to pay his expenses and live. Our expense is but a small percentage when spread over sales that amount to millions of dollars annually.

We simply combine the buying and selling of two thousand average stores. We save the wasteful methods that cost more than the merchandise, and we give the saving to you. This is the modern method of business, and the buying of the 20th century will be done more and more by mail. In this way we are now saving our customers from four to five million dollars annually. You will become one of those customers when you see this book.

Send Only 15 Cents If you want our catalogue, fill out carefully the slip to the left of this, and mail it to us today, enclosing 15 cents. This catalogue which we offer you costs us about 70 cents to print, even in million lots. The postage on it costs us 32 cents more. We ask you to send us but 15 cents (less than half the postage alone) just to show that you do not send from mere curiosity. This book will save any average family at least $100 per year. If you don't find that it will save you at least a hundred times what it costs you, simply write us, and we will cheerfully send your 15 cents back.

Please send today, before you forget it.

5. What is the origin of the phrase "by hook or by crook?"

Questions of the Week

1. In what sense must Paul's reference to the church as the pillar and ground of the truth (1 Timothy 3:15) be understood?

The clause, to which reference is made in the question, has been, by some, applied to Timothy; but the Greek verb, anastrophethai, to conduct oneself, is not suited by such metaphors as "pillar" and "ground," and the absence of the Greek pronoun necessary to make the clause descriptive of Timothy, indicates that the writer of the question rightly understood the clause as descriptive of the church. The word rendered "pillar" is stulos, and signifies a column, a pillar, a support. The church is the support of the truth, as a pillar is of a building. It supports it; it holds it together. To the church is intrusted the maintenance and defense of the truth, and the transmission of it to future times. It is by the church that the truth is upheld to the world. The Scriptures do not derive their authority from the church, as Romanists contend, for, in another sense, the truth is the pillar and ground of the church; but, referring to an ancient custom of erecting pillars to which proclamations of various sorts might be affixed, the church holds forth the truth as the pillar does the proclamation.

The word rendered "ground" is hedraïoma, and means a stay, a support, a foundation. The adjective forms signify settled, fixed, steady, constant. The verb forms signify to place or set upon a foundation, to fix firmly, to establish. Hence the clause is to be understood as teaching that it is by the church the truth is made fast, firm, fixed; and placed upon a sure and abiding foundation before the world. The stability and permanence of the truth in the world is dependent upon the church. The church is such a pillar and ground because it is itself founded upon a rock, so that the gates of hell cannot prevail against it; and, again, it is because of this great and blessed fact that God's saving truth is preserved from age to age.

B. F. WHITEMORE.

The church is frequently compared to a house or temple (1 Cor. 3:16; 1 Pet. 2:5), and persons whose eminence and influence give stability and authority to the church are called pillars. Paul says that James, Peter and John were in repute as pillars, and Clements Romanus speaks of Peter and Paul as "the greatest and most righteous pillars" of the church. In this passage the metaphor is changed. Truth is the temple, and the church is a pillar, strong and well grounded, in this temple. The church is the pillar and stay of the truth, because it is the body of Christ, the visible manifestation of his love to the world; because it is the organized witness to the truth, going into all the world to bear its testimony; and because it defends and sustains the truth by "preaching it, preserving it un-mutilated and pure, and transmitting it to posterity."

2. Can two nations, both claiming to be Christians, go to war, one with the other, and still continue in Christian fellowship?

There is no such thing as Christian fellowship between nations. When we speak of Christian nations, we simply mean that the influences of Christianity are predominant among the people as compared with other forms of religious belief. When Christian men or women are mentioned as individuals the term is used to indicate that such persons have fully accepted the doctrines of Christian faith and made a practical application of its principles to their daily conduct. Between such individuals there is Christian fellowship regardless of nationality, but it cannot exist in any other relation, for the reason that religion and fellowship are strictly personal in their nature. Answering the spirit rather than the letter of the question, it may be said that civilized diplomacy permits no sentiments of love or hatred as between nations in their sovereign capacity, either in peace or in war, and as love lies at the base of fellowship we cannot properly speak of any kind of fellowship as between nations. Intercourse between enlightened nations is governed by international law, itself a development largely ethical, in the

3. In view of the prohibition of the Christian marrying an unbeliever, would it be the duty of a man who had been converted to break an engagement to marry a worldly girl which he had made prior to his conversion?

After fully considering all that is said in the New Testament on the subject, I think there is much room for doubt about the prohibition referred to, presumably in 11 Cor. 6; 14. From this verse to chapter 7:1, inclusive, the apostle seems to forbid too much social intercourse generally with idolatrous and heathenish people, rather than to have in view the marriage relation especially. In 1 Cor. 7:12-16, separation from the unbelieving husband or wife is discountenanced, because the believing spouse may be able to sanctify—that is, make holy—the unregenerate mate, and may effect conversion to salvation. In the same chapter and other passages of the apostolic writings marriage is encouraged without any restrictions. In Gal. 5:1, and Acts 15:10, the word "yoke" is used in a somewhat similar connection to that supposed to contain the implied prohibition. In Phil. 4:3, Paul addresses some unknown individual as "yoke-fellow," and it is quite certain he does not mean his wife. But if it is admitted that the text cited prohibits intermarriage between Christians and unbelievers, it must be construed with reference to the conditions of sensual idolatry universally prevailing at that period in the city of Corinth. Paul was addressing a small community of Christians in a very large heathen city, and it is as if we should advise Christians in China and India but break it he ought, otherwise he transgresses the apostolic command. And the command is no unreasonable, capricious prohibition, but one based on sound sense, many a dreary, uncongenial home can attest. To a real follower of Christ, his religion the supreme thing in his being, and if he married a woman who does not sympathize with him in this matter, there will be a drifting apart and a separation of heart detrimental to married happiness. If he is already married when his conversion takes place, is not justified in separating from his wife the ground of her not being a Christian, but he would be foolish and disobedient to Christian principle in marrying a worldly girl.

4. What is the origin of druggists' colored bottles for signs?

Like the symbolical figures often seen upon the bottles, it originated among those ancient chemists, the Moors of Arabia and Spain. The manufacturers of their own chemicals they used both in this and in their experiments, retorts and vessels similar in shapes, bottles, and these vessels, with their various colored fluids, became associated in the public mind with the men who used them, and hence became signs.

5. If a Christian discovers that a company which he holds shares is insolvent and the verge of failure, is he justified in selling his shares?

A stockholder is justified in going in open market and selling his holdings at a time, provided the stock has an actual market value at the moment of offering. The rule is that the purchaser buys at his own risk, and he is supposed to inform himself fully regarding the value of stock and condition of the concern before buying. Of course if a seller disposed of stock after the insolvency had become an actual fact, he would be doing a criminal thing. If, on the other hand, he has a "pointer," he may buy or sell to advantage as his judgment directs. I know this may not be good morals, but it is the rule of the street.

E. J. WILSON.

Certainly not. Though the shares may have a market value so long as it is not generally known that the company is insolvent to sell such stock to an innocent purchaser would be, looked at from a moral standpoint as wrong as to sell anything which has no value at the time sale is made. Although sell such stock under the conditions outlined might not be illegal, no Christian nor worldly man of business could engage in such transaction, and still lay any valid claims to being honest. Many things which are not illegal, are, notwithstanding, as wrong morally as anything can well be. Would a man who is really upright sell as a sound animal a horse—providing he could know that it would go permanently blind within a few days—even though the purchaser should ask no questions whatever about the horse? It would seem that there can be no question as to justification in such transactions, and the Golden Rule applies here with particular force.

perfection of which Christianity has exerted no small influence. This law is entirely devoid of sentiment and is merely definitive of right and wrong. Its rules are imperative, and independent of whether the relations between nations are, as properly expressed, either friendly or unfriendly.

L. B. RUSSELL.

They cannot. All war is of the devil, and has nothing in common with Christianity; least of all, the war between two professedly Christian nations. As the world's spiritual enlightenment progresses, men will understand this better. War settles nothing, proves no principle, satisfies no sense of justice or right. It is simply the resort to the ancient, savage method of brute force. Sometimes it takes the whimsical form of a religious war—"slaying people for the love of God." Not once in a hundred battles have the poor soldiers on the opposing sides any personal quarrel with each other. They are merely pawns for the players, or national leaders, who are making the war to satisfy their own selfish ends, and who ruthlessly sacrifice men as they would pieces on a chess-board, to gain a personal advantage. The great mass of any nation rarely seeks war, but is nearly always driven, bullied, forced, thrust into it by the few. The government, or Cabinet, or nation whose leaders profess Christianity, can and should settle all disputes with other nations by arbitration.

R. M. BURDEN.

not to intermarry with Buddhists and Mohammedans, only more aggravated. My judgment is that in the case supposed in the question, the young man would not be justified by Christian principle in revoking his engagement with the young woman for the sole reason that she has not professed a faith in Christ. In a large majority of such cases marriage is followed by the conversion of the unbeliever.

L. B. RUSSELL.

In my opinion that would be his ultimate duty, but it should not be done lightly or hastily. An engagement is a serious matter, which no conscientious man, least of all a Christian, would break save under dire necessity. The rupture might entail on the girl great injury to her health and happiness, and almost certainly would produce in her mind a prejudice against religion which might never be removed. The young man ought by all means to strive to win her for Christ. He should pray earnestly for her, should plead with her and should enlist the efforts of Christian women (these for obvious reasons should not be unmarried women) in seeking her conversion. If she loves and respects him, his influence will be very potent in leading her to the Saviour. But if she is obdurate, and especially if she ridicules his faith as some "worldly girls" do, he ought for his own soul's sake to break the engagement. It should be done reluctantly, and the young man should wait a long time before marrying any one else;

In answer to Inquirer of Milbury, Mass., I find inquiry at the Washburn Observatory, this city that the proper motions of the stars visible to the naked eye, have been measured for the last 150 years quite closely and that the greatest observed motion is 8 seconds per annum, equal to about 1 minute 7½ years, or 1 degree in 450 years. A displacement of ¼ degree is about as close as one would detect with the eye in a 2 degree sky space=112 years. Possibly Inquirer had vague first impressions and means of measuring celestial angles. I once had the same notion about the supposed displacement of two stars in the "Big Dipper Handle."

THE NELSON FARM, RECENTLY PURCHASED FOR THE SUPPORT OF ASSISTED STUDENTS OF WASHINGTON COLLEGE, TENN.

A PIONEER MOUNTAIN COLLEGE

How Washington College, Tennessee, is Endeavoring to Meet the Need of its Mountain Field...

BY REV. JAMES T. COOTER

REPORTS just received from Washington College, Tennessee, indicate that the historic institution, now about one hundred and twenty years old, is putting forth new powers and is surpassing its own brilliant record. Since the former notice of its work which appeared in this journal two years ago, it has acquired another farm of 11 acres and has added a printing office and its educational appliances. The farm is an interesting acquisition on account of its associations. It was the boyhood home of Dr. David Nelson, author of several famous theological works and the writer of many hymns, including the well-known hymn beginning, "The days are gliding swiftly by, and I, a pilgrim singer." Dr. Nelson in his youth attended the college and graduated under its first president. Washington College is gratified at securing the farm, and at the additional opportunities for industrial training which it affords. The printing office operates in the same direction, and a fair proportion of job work is done there, it promises eventually to be not only an opportunity for teaching the students the printer's trade, but to be a source of profit to the institution. The arrangement with students who cannot afford to pay the whole of their expenses at this tough college and who yet are anxious to have a college education, is that they will give eighteen hours a week to labor in some industrial department for the benefit of the college.

The enrollment this session is about one hundred and fifty, of whom about sixty are girls. The ages of the students vary from sixteen to twenty-eight years. An indefinite number, which increases from year to year, belong to the class who have to give manual labor for part of their expenses. If it were possible to receive all who apply on this basis, the list would however, has not an endowment sufficient for more than a limited number. It is worthy of notice that these assisted students uniformly turn out well. The qualities which lead a boy or girl to toil for the opportunity of learning, are those of Henry Kendall College. Another graduate became Superintendent of Instruction in his home county in North Carolina and now represents it in the Legislature. Some old records, recently discovered, show that of the graduates of the college prior to the date, seventy-one had become ministers, twenty-seven physicians, and twenty lawyers, and one, James A. Lyon, became a professor at Oxford University.

The college is favorably situated for its work in the heart of the mountain district, and, being free from taxation, is able to offer its advantages on low terms, which are still further reduced in the cases above mentioned, by accepting manual labor in lieu of money. It would gladly extend these facilities to a larger number were it possible, and for this reason it invites benevolent people to aid them in the work. A boy or a girl who is willing to work eighteen hours weekly on the farm, or in the industrial departments, has to pay only fifty dollars a year to enjoy all the advantages of a college course. It would gratify the managers and would fill the hearts of some poor boy or girl with joy, if some kindly person would undertake to pay the fifty dollars a year needed for the purpose. The college also appeals for help in its general resources. About $4,400 remains to be paid on the purchase of the Nelson Farm, an amount comparatively small, but of serious concern to an institution whose work is so largely philanthropic. Contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be duly acknowledged, or may be sent to the President, Rev. James T. Cooter, Washington College, Limestone, Tenn.

TEXT, Psalms 103: 5:
So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's

A SERMON BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

THERE flies out from my text the most majestic of all the feathered creation—an eagle. Other birds have more beauty of plume and more sweetness of voice, but none of them has such power of beak, such clutch of claw, such expansion of wing, such height of soaring, such wideness of dominion. Its appetite rejects the carrion that invites the vulture, and in most cases its food is fresh and clean. Leveling its neck for flight, in spiral curve it swings itself toward the noonday sun. It has been known to live a hundred years. What concentration of all that is sublime in the golden eagle, the crested eagle, the imperial eagle, the martial eagle, the booted eagle, the Jeanle Blanc eagle! But after a while in its life comes the molting process, and it looks ragged and worn and unattractive, and feels like moping in its nest on the high crags. But weeks go by, and the old feathers are gone, and new ornithological attire is put on, and its beak, which was overgrown, has the surplus of bone beaten off against the rocks, and it gets back its old capacity for food, and again it mounts the heavens in unchallenged and boundless kingdoms of air and light. David, the author of the text, had watched these monarchs of the sky, and knew their habits, and one day, exulting in his own physical and spiritual rejuvenescence, he says to his own soul: "You are getting younger all the time. You make me think of an eagle which I saw yesterday, just after its molting season, swinging through the valley of Jehoshaphat, and then circling around the head of Mount Olivet. O, my soul, 'thy youth is renewed like the eagle's.'"

The fact is that people get old too fast. They allow the years to run away with them. The almanac and the family record discourage them. Some of you are older than you have any business to be. You ought to realize that as the body gets older the soul ought to get younger. Coming on toward old age, you are only in the molting season, and after that you will have better wings, take higher flight and reign in clearer atmosphere. Our religion bids us to look after the welfare of the body as well as of the soul, and the first part as well as the latter part of my subject is appropriate for the pulpit.

Famous Centenarians

Many might turn the years backward and get younger by changing their physical habits. The simpler life one leads, the longer he lives. Thomas Parr, of Shropshire, England, was a plain man and worked on a farm for a livelihood. At one hundred and twenty years of age he was at his daily toil. He had lived under nine kings of England. When one hundred and fifty-two years of age he was heard of in London. The king desired to see him and ordered him to the palace, where he was so richly and royally treated that it destroyed his health, and he died at one hundred and fifty-two years and nine months of age. When Doctor Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of blood, made post-mortem examination of Thomas Parr, he declared there were no signs of senile decay in the body. That man must have renewed his youth, like the eagle, again and again.

All occupations and professions have afforded illustrations of rejuvenescence. Hippocrates, the father of medicine, lived one hundred and nine years, and among those eminent in the medical profession who became septuagenarians and octogenarians and nonagenarians were Darwin, Gall, Boerhaave, Jenner and Ruysch, observing themselves the laws of health that they taught their patients. In art and literature and science, among those who lived into the eighties were Plato, and Franklin, and Carlyle, and Goethe, and Buffon, and Halley. Sophocles reached the nineties. You cannot tell how old a man is from the number of years he has lived. I have known people actually boyish in their disposition at eighty years of age, while Louis II., King of Hungary, died of old age at twenty. Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation," was composed at seventy years of age. Humboldt wrote his immortal work, "The Cosmos," at seventy-five. William Cullen Bryant, at eighty-two years of age, in my house, read without spectacles "Thanatopsis," which he had composed when eighteen years of age. Isocrates did illustrious work at ninety-four. Lintinus Gorgias was busy when death came to him at one hundred and seven years of age. Herschel at eighty years of age was hard at work in stellar exploration. Masinissa, King of Numidia, at ninety years of age led a victorious cavalry charge against the Carthaginians. Titian was engaged on his greatest painting when he died, in his one hundredth year. How often they must have renewed their youth!

Lengthened Lives

But the average longevity of those in private life, and with less mental strain and no conspicuous success, is much larger than the average longevity of the renowned. There are hundreds of thousands of men and women now renewing their youth like the eagle's, so that the possibility of such a turning back of the years is all around us being demonstrated.

Bismarck, the greatest of German statesmen, a long while before his decease passed his eightieth milestone. When Gladstone was eighty-three years of age I ran with him up and down the hills of Hawarden. We started for a walk, but it got to be a run. All those men again and again renewed their youth.

Some one writes me, "Is not three score and ten the bound of human life, according to the Bible?" My reply is that Moses (not David), who wrote that psalm, was giving a statistic of his own day. Through better understanding of the laws of health and advancement of medical science, the statistics of longevity have mightily changed since the time of Moses, and the day is coming when a nonagenarian will no longer be a wonder. Phlebotomy shortened the life of whole generations, and the lancet that bled for everything is now rarely taken from the doctor's pocket. Dentistry has given power of healthy mastication to the human race, and thus added greatly to the prolongation of life. Electric lights have improved human sight, which used to be strained by the dim tallow candle. The dire diseases which under other names did their fatal work, and were considered almost incurable, now in majority of cases are conquered. Vaccination, which has saved millions of lives and balked the greatest scourge of nations, and surgery, which has advanced more than any other science, have done more than can be told for the prolongation of human life. The X-ray has turned the human body, which was opaque, into a lighted castle. It is to renew youth than in any other age. When Paul stopped the jailer from suicide by commanding, "Do thyself no harm," he showed himself interested in the physical as well as moral life of man. Among the blessings which God promised, was that in which he said, "With long life will I satisfy thee," and David, in my text, illustrates the possibility of palinogenesis or rejuvenescence.

But the body is the smallest and least important part of you. It is your soul that most needs rejuvenation, but that will also help bodily vivification. In order to do this, I advise you to banish as far as possible all fretfulness out of your life. The doing of that will make you ten years younger. I know many good, Christian people who are worrying themselves out in managing the affairs of the universe. They have undertaken too big a job. They are trying to drive too long and fiery a team. They have all the affairs of church and state on hand, and they fret about this, and fret about that, and fret about the other thing. They fear that China will be divided up among the nations, and there will be an entanglement causing wars such as we have never heard of. They fear that Edward VII. will not be as wise a king as his mother was a queen.

Fatal Fretting

They are appalled at the accumulated national debt. They fear society is going to pieces by reason of immoralities. They apprehend that America will be overcrowded with foreigners. They say the newspapers are getting so bad that this country is going to be utterly demoralized. They are all the time apprehensive of social and religious and political calamities, and it is telling on their mental health, depressing their physical health, and, instead of renewing their youth like the eagle's, they are imitating the eagle who would sit in his nest of sticks lined with grass on the rock, mourning about the woes of the ornithological world, the loneliness of the pelican, the filthiness of the vulture, the croak of the raven, the recklessness of the albatross. Would that improve things? No. It would be a molting process for that eagle which would never close, and it would only get thinner and more gloomy, and less able to gain food for its young, and less able to enjoy a landscape as it appears under a twenty-mile flight on a summer morning under the blue heavens.

I do not advise you to be indifferent to these great questions that pertain to church and state and nations, but not to fret about them. Realize that it is not an anarchy that has charge of affairs in this world, but a divine government. At the head of this universe is a King whose eye is omniscience, and whose arm is omnipotence, and whose heart is infinite love. His government is not going to be a failure. He cannot be defeated. Better trust him in the management of this world and of all worlds.

All You and I Have to Do is to accomplish the work that Providence has put in our hands. That is all we have to be responsible for. In a well-managed orchestra the players upon stringed and wind instruments do not watch each other. The cornetist does not look to see how the violinist is drawing the bow over the strings, nor does the flute scrutinize the drum. They all watch the baton of the leader. And we are all carrying our part, however insignificant it may be, in the great harmony of this world and of the universe which our Lord is leading, and we all have to watch his command and do our best and not bother ourselves about the success or failure of other performers. If you want to renew your youth, better stop managing the affairs of the universe.

Mythology tells us that Jason begged Medea, the goddess, to take some of the years of his life and give them to his father. She promised that without abbreviating the son's life she would prolong his father's life. She filled the caldron with herbs and the blood of beasts and birds, and then stirred the caldron and put some of the juices in the mouth of the aged father, and it is said that his hair turned from white to black, the shriveled limbs rounded into robust health, and the rejuvenated man felt as he did at forty years of age. All that is a poetic myth. But a brightened religious hope and a strengthened faith in God's providence have rejuvenated many a man in disposition and usefulness and renewed his youth like the eagle's. On the contrary, it is thought that worriment is becoming in this country a national disease and it has been called "Americanitis."

Another mode of rejuvenescence is much of the time associating with the younger than yourself rather than with those who are as old or older. If you have no children of your own, better adopt a child. There are in this country an all countries orphans by the tens of thousands. Go to one of the asylums or institutions where friendless children are cared for and select some little one with an honest eye and good disposition, take him to your home. Put around all the elevating and happy influences can provide. In two years he will be part of your life, and his company to will be indispensable. It will make twenty years younger. He will be illumination to the evening of your life and he will speak your praise long after you have departed from this world, and heavenly places you will have been guarded by the great friend of children—the Lord Jesus.

Youthful Associations

It will take all time and all eternity to fully appreciate the work of Van Meter on this side of the sea, and of Barnard on the other side, in putting poor orphan children in good homes in America and Ireland. Through that process waifs of streets have passed up from poverty and wretchedness into bright homes, churches and pulpits, and legislative halls and senates, and many have already been crowned in a better world, the work being in asylums on earth completed in the aces of heaven.

Whether by such adoption of children or in some other way, call around you young. Become their associates, their confidants, their encouragement. When you do them good, they will do you good. The old eagle while companioning in its nest with young eagles will feel its strength coming into its wing, new life into its eye, new ambition to cut a circle nearer the sun, and for the time will forget the hurricanes that have ruffled its plumage and the storms of many years that have swept over its mountain eyrie. The coming years of life ought to be the best of it, as an arrival in port ought to be happier than embarkation. It is better to have the cyclones behind you than before you. Some one will say: "David must renew his youth, but I have been through so much there is no such thing for me to be revived." You are wrong. You have not gone through as much as David went through. He had all the experiences shepherd-boy, armor-bearer, king's bodyguard, hunter of wild beasts, warrior monarch. He was forty years on a reigning throne. He was the Oriental hero in many a battle; made moral mistakes enough to destroy him; prostrated a giant with one stroke; was the father of Hebrew poetry and wrote poems which all the subsequent centuries have been chanting dramatized dementia to escape assassination; ran against Ahithophel's betrayal and Saul's jealousy, and Absalom's insurrection, and made Jerusalem the religious capital of the world. If after all that, could renew his youth, you ought to be able to do the same.

Dying into New Life

Again, I remark: Going out of this to the Christian is rejuvenescence. When a holy glee it must be for those who in this world had the aches and pains and limitations of old age. The halting of the rheumatic or infirm foot, exchanged for wing of celestial velocity. The dim vision of worn-out optic nerve, exchanged for a sight that takes all heaven at a glance. The mental depression that comes from sense of decay, exchanged for the exultation of faculties lustrous and ever-strengthening. Sad reminiscence exchanged for glowing anticipation. How cheery thaged who love and trust the Lord to think that their last years of taking off are decrepitude are the molting season referred to in the text. Shedding of all weaknesses. Shedding of all unholy ambitions. Shedding of all dislikes. Shedding of all hindrances. If the eagle knew that at annual pulling down and taking off and shriveling were preparation for new wings, it would not sit moping in its nest. But you, O son and daughter of God, ought to be wise enough to know that all this process you are going through is preparation for wings. Substitution of heavenly speed and power for earthly lethargy and faltering. David felt the need of wings when he cried out: "O that I had the wings of a dove, that I might fly away and be at rest!" The text suggests that heaven is

An Eternal Youth

A cycle of celestial years will not leave a mark upon the immortal nature. Eternity will not work upon the soul in heaven any change, unless it be more radiance and more wisdom and more rapture. A rolling on from glory to glory! In anticipation of that some of the happiest people on earth are aged Christians. The mightiest testimonies have been given by the veterans in the Gospel army. While some of the aged have allowed themselves to become morose and cynical and impatient with youth and pessimistic about the world, and have become possessed with the spirit of scold and fault-finding, and are fearful of being crowded out of their sphere, many of the aged have been glad to step aside that others may have a chance, and are hopeful about the world, expecting its redemption instead of its depletion, and they are inspiration and comfort and helpfulness to the household and to the neighborhood and to the church. The children hail the good old man as he comes down the road. His smile, his words, his manner, his whole life make the world think better of religion. Noah Webster, the greatest of lexicographers, departing this life at eighty-five years of age, exclaimed: "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him against that day." The venerable Daniel Webster, the greatest of American lawyers and statesmen, in his last hours said: "I had intended to prepare a work for the press to bear my testimony to Christianity, but it is now too late. Still, I would like to bear witness to the Gospel before I die." Being too weak to hold a pen, he dictated to a scribe his words of triumphant faith.

I congratulate all aged Christians that the molting season will soon be over, and you will mount higher than eagle ever ascended. What a good thing that you are soon to get rid of winter's cold and summer's heat, and drenching rain and hovering clouds, and live in superbest climate of the universe, whether it be this world made over as to atmosphere and contour, or in some star which mighty telescope hails from the observatory, or in some centre around which all worlds wheel! It is all ready, and has been ready, as near as I can calculate, since eighteen hundred and seventy-one years ago, when Christ went up after saying: "I go to prepare a place for you." What a good thing to get rid of this world's vicissitudes and enter upon glorious certainties, and to have no surprises except those that are exhilarant, as when Milton may ring a new canto, or Chrysostom may speak with a new eloquence, or Handel may render a new symphony, for I do not suppose that those who were mighty on earth are going to be idlers in heaven.

What a good thing it is, all ye aged Christians, that you can soon get rid of dulled ear, and sight that requires strong eyeglasses, and infirmities which make you hold on to the banister, leaving you panting at the head of the stairs, and enter a land of eternal health, where the most rubicund cheek of robust life on earth would be emaciation compared with the vigor of the immortals. What a good thing to get beyond being misunderstood, and blamed for what you could not help, and picked at by a hard world, and then pass into a heavenly society where all think well of each other, and friendships are eternal, depreciation and slander and backbiting unknown, for the gate of heaven was shut against them in the statement, "Without are dogs." What a good thing to have satisfying and glorious explanation of things that puzzled you twenty, or forty, or eighty years; to have the interrogation point abolished, and all mystery solved, and God's government vindicated, and you will see why he allowed sin and sorrow to come into the world, and why the bad were permitted to live so long and the good were cut off in the time of their greatest usefulness, and why so many of the consecrated find life a struggle, while many of the infamous ride prosperously, princes a-foot and beggars a-horseback, and the last honest question shall have been answered.

I congratulate all Christians who are in the eventide. Good cheer to all of you. Your best days are yet to come. You are yet to hear the best songs, see the grandest sights, take the most delightful journeys, form the most elevating friendships, and after ten thousand

Years of Transport

you will be no nearer the last rapture than when you were thrilled with the first.

You will have in heaven just what you want. Are you tired? Then heaven will be rest. Are you passionately fond of sweet sounds? Then it will be music. Are you stirred by pictures? There will be all the colors on the new heavens and on the jasper sea. Are you fond of great architecture? There you will find the temple of God, and the Lamb, and the uplifted thrones. Are you longing to get back to your loved ones who have ascended? Then it will be reunion. Are you a home body? Then it will be home. Here and there in this world you will find some one who now lives where he was born, and three or four generations may have dwelt in the same house, but most people have had several homes—the home of childhood, the home they built or rented for their early manhood, the home of riper and more prosperous years. But all homes put together, precious as they are in remembrance or from present occupancy, cannot equal the heavenly home in the House of Many Mansions. No sickness will ever come there, for it is promised "there shall be no more pain." No parting at the front door; no last look at faces never to be seen again, but home with God, home with each other, home forever. And that right after the molting season, when "thy youth is renewed like the eagle's."

Wings to hover free
O'er dawn-empurpled sea,
Wings 'bove life to soar,
And beyond death forever more.

Cordial and Grateful Missionary Letters—Urgent Needs Providentially Supplied Through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Orphan Fund

BY the latest mails, we have received several important letters from missionaries in India, containing interesting news of the progress of the orphan work. Two of these letters, which are given below, have a special interest for all readers of this journal, who had had an active share in the great work of saving the famine waifs. The first is as follows:

Providential Generosity

TENT OF ESPLANADE,
BOMBAY, Jan. 11, 1901.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—Your letter of Dec. 10, 1900, containing draft for twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) came to hand by the last mail. It seems very wonderful, does the magnificent response you are getting to your appeal for our orphans.

I have never known anything like it, and it seems to be growing. You and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are being used to a great and very necessary work. Nothing but a great movement of this kind would have helped us out. Without this arrangement, providing for the orphans for a number of years, we would have been left with a big family on our hands, and a decreasing income. Now, we feel that it is all right, and though there may be no present famine to stir the people up to give, a system of this kind will keep the much-needed support flowing in.

On the 24th of this month, we are to have a full meeting of the committee in Bombay, and your letters will be brought before it, and I am sure something will be done to put our side of the work in ruling order with the American part. Nothing short of a perfect system will make it go and keep it going. I will write you a full report of what we do in the committee.

I am glad to say that Bro. Frease (our Treasurer lately sick of fever) is doing well, and only needs a few months of rest to make him as strong as ever. I enclose receipt for the $25,000 with more thankfulness than I can express.

I will live in tents till the monsoon, but letters will reach me all the same, whether addressed to Methodist Mission, Grant Road, or to Tent No. 7, Esplanade.

I am, yours very truly,

W. H. STEPHENS.

Systematizing the Work

The second letter is from the Rev. R. A. Hume, of the Ahmednagar Mission, and is given below:

AHMEDNAGAR, INDIA.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—Yesterday I received copy of your letter to the Rev. W. H. Stephens, Secretary CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund Committee. As usual, you have put the matter about the support of famine children in a clear, business-like way. I have no doubt that all the members of our committee will understand it. Again I thank you for your enterprise and your Christian enthusiasm in this important Christian undertaking.

A meeting of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Committee has been called for Thursday, Jan. 24, in Bombay. I will then do my best to lead the committee to try to appoint a special agent to manage the correspondence of the famine children work with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and with the patrons of the children. Your proposal is in the interests of both economy and efficiency, and I certainly hope a suitable person can be found. Without some such agent, almost certainly some missionaries will sometimes fail to send quarterly reports according to agreement, and then the donors might be disappointed. Unfortunately, most missionaries are burdened with work, and correspondence is one of those things which can easily be deferred.

Now that my brother is returned to India, I propose to resign the chairmanship of the committee in his favor. The chairman and secretary should, if possible, live in Bombay City, where they can easily confer with one another, and have executive committee meetings without delay and without expense whenever necessary. I cannot, from Ahmednagar, properly act as chairman, except when no one else is available. My brother is experienced and reliable, and so I trust you will not feel disappointed at my withdrawing in his favor, I am,

Gratefully yours,

R. A. HUME.

$25,000 MORE FOR INDIA ORPHANS

RECEIVED from Dr. Louis Klopsch, Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York, TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS ($25,000), realizing rupees 75,750 for the second four months' support of the FIVE THOUSAND ORPHANS adopted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, making a total of $50,000 remitted to date on account of that branch of the India Relief Work.

.. FOR A NATIONAL CHURCH FEDERATION ..

An Effort to Combine the Aggressive Agencies of the American Churches in a United Organization

FOR many years past, intelligent men within and without the churches, have noticed with astonishment that the leaders of the various denominations have failed to learn the lesson of co-operation, which, in manufacturing industries, has been so potent a feature of our times. The forces on the side of evil are so strong that it would appear that the forces on the side of Christ and righteousness should unite in opposition to them. Yet, hitherto they have preferred to act independently, each denomination maintaining Boards and machinery for separate work. In this way there has been a duplication of effort, and a waste, both of energy and money. The churches, while standing for separate religious principles, are in accord on the duty of aggressive work. Why, then, having the same objects in common, should they not agree to work as comrades, not as rivals and competitors? Tentative attempts have already been made to effect such united action, and they have succeeded so well that the time has come for national organization. A convention has been held in Philadelphia to arrange the terms of such a combination. The following article, by a prominent leader in the effort, has been prepared to inform our readers of the results:

Combination, co-operation, "getting together," are the sign-marks of the age in almost every department of human endeavor. Considerations of economy, self-interest, and plain common sense demand that it shall be so. The wisdom of Aesop's fable as to the bundle of fagots, that could only be broken when each fagot was taken separately, has always been evident, even to the minds of children. The marvel of it all is that a principle of action with so many and such obvious advantages, making so clearly for enlarged power and success, so simple in its operations, tried and proved by ages of experience in other lines, should not have been adopted long ago in a large and positive form by the numerous sects or religious bodies working under the common name of the Christian Church. Doubtless the chief reason may be found in the fact, lamentable as it is, that nowhere has the divisive spirit among men, the spirit of separatism, of aloofness, cut such sharp and deep lines, opened such wide and seemingly impassable chasms as in matters of religious faith, forms and practice. Thus have the churches failed often to take advantage of such legitimate means as lay within their reach to push their work ahead, to enlarge their boundaries, and promote the great ends common to them all.

Happily we may begin to speak of these things now in past tenses. A brighter and a better day has dawned for the Christian Church. Christian fellowship, the truth as to the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, always a fundamental tenet of Christian faith, but widely belied in professed Christian practice, has come down more and more from the region of abstraction and worked itself into the real everyday life of the church memberships. The clasping of hands across sectarian lines for worship and for service has been one of the happiest and most hopeful signs of the times during the past twenty-five or thirty years. There has been much "getting together" among the churches both in the Old World and the New, some under the specific name of federations and others with different designations, but all with the same spirit and purpose. The world has never seen a more striking and magnificent manifestation of Christian unity and fellowship than the Ecumenical Mission Conference in New York City last year.

That federation may help in a large, direct and positive way in solving the peculiar, difficult and serious problems confronting the churches in our great and growing cities, has been proved beyond a peradventure by the Federation of Churches and Christian Workers in New York City during the five years of its existence. Within this period it has made a thorough and exhaustive religious and sociological canvass of ten assembly districts within the bounds of Greater New York, chiefly in the tenement regions, and, as a result, placed at the service of all interested in the evangelization of the city and the general uplift of the masses a vast amount of reliable data, arranged and presented with scientific clearness and accuracy, concerning the religious preferences of the people, their social and moral environment, their home and family conditions, their individual status, and many other things, an understanding of which is absolutely essential to intelligent and successful church work in these districts. The Federation has planned to extend this canvass to every part of the metropolis. This is a special kind of service which church federations are designed to render every community where they are established. This and the prevention of the over-churching of some communities and the under-churching of others, the more economic and effective administration of all mission agencies, and the massing of religious forces for the promotion of various common ends, this is the kind of work which all church federations are constituted and intended to do.

The movement for National Church Federation in America opened the first chapter of its history at a meeting held in the city of New York, on Feb. 1 and 2, 1900. This meeting was called by a number of men acquainted with the workings of federation in various localities in America, who had become convinced that the time was ripe for a work of national scope. The outcome of this conference was the appointment of a National Committee empowered to canvass the whole subject of national federation, to arouse the interest of churches in this direction, to formulate a plan of permanent organization, and report at a meeting to be called a year from that time.

Thus constituted, the committee opened its headquarters at 83 Bible House early in 1900, with Dr. Sanford in charge, and active work began at once along the lines indicated in the appointment. A year has passed since then, a year which the national committee can look back upon with the utmost satisfaction. The results achieved were all and even more than had been expected. Secretary Sanford traveled extensively East and West in the interests of the movement, addressing ministerial bodies, church conferences and other religious gatherings, advising and conferring with pastors and laymen seeking light and guidance on the subject, and conducting besides a large correspondence directed to the same ends. He found, generally, a quick and hearty responsiveness to his efforts among churches and pastors, especially among those whom he was able to reach personally. Much seed was sown where no visible growth has yet appeared, but the practical results achieved were large and gratifying.

Local church federations owing their existence chiefly to the National Committee's work are now to be found in Chicago, Jersey City, Newark, Syracuse, Schenectady, and Portland and Auburn, Me., while the first steps have been taken for the formation of similar societies in several other cities. But the largest and most gratifying outcome of the committee's propaganda thus far has been the organization of the Federation of Churches and Christian Workers in the State of New York. This act was consummated in a meeting held in Syracuse, November 13 and 14, 1900.

The second chapter in national federation history was opened at a conference held in Philadelphia on Feb. 5, 1901, pursuant to the instructions given at the formation of the National Committee. This meeting lasted two days, and brought together the representatives of nearly all the local and State federations in existence in America and other eminent and representative religious leaders in many denominations. The action taken, as hoped and expected, was that of putting the National Federation solidly on its feet, a permanent and duly organized body.

The officers elected were as follows:

PRESIDENT. J. Cleveland Cady, New York.	Washington Choate, George U. Wenner, Frank Mason North, Rev. S. T. Willis, Sam'l Francis, D.D., Lewis Francis, D.D., Rev. Rufus W. Miller, Rivington, D. Lord, J. W. Hegeman, Phil E. Hendrix, D.D., L. Chas. E. Hughes, Esq., James B. Brooks, L. Hon. Charles H. Knapp, Mr. John S. Huyler, Hon. Morris W. Seyr, Mr. William J. Miller, Mr. W. H. Beach, Henry C. M. Ingraham, Esq.
VICE-PRESIDENTS. Hon. Benj. Odell, Mr. William E. Dodge, Col. Jacob L. Greene, Mr. Horace Benton, Mr. E. W. Blatchford, Hon. Chas. A. Schieren, Mr. Wm. N. Hartshorn, Mr. Samuel Young, Capt. Alfred T. Mahan, Judge Grosscup, Mr. John H. Converse.	Hon. Burton Mansfield, Mr. Lucien C. Warren, Mr. Wm. H. Wanamaker, Mr. Fred'k Frelinghuysen, Chas. L. Thompson, D.D., Mr. George Griffiths, Mr. Colgate Hoyt, Prof. Jno. B. Clark, I.
RECORDING SECRETARY. Wm. A. Rice, D.D., Newark, N. J.
EXECUTIVE BOARD. W. H. P. Faunce, D.D., Wm. Hayes Ward, LL.D., Chas. L. Thompson, D.D., John B. Calvert, D.D., E. Walpole Warren, D.D.,

Eleven denominations are represented in this official list, namely, Methodist Baptist, Presbyterian, Lutheran, Disciples of Christ, Protestant Episcopal, Congregational, Reformed, United Brethren, Evangelical Association and Christian Convention. The conditions of membership in the National Federation are made as broad and comprehensive as possible with a view of obtaining a full and representative of the Christian church. It is provided by the constitution of national body that membership in it may be obtained by any organization doing federative church work, by local churches on the payment of an annual subscription of ten or more dollars, and by individuals in sympathy with the organization on payment of an annual subscription of one or more dollars. The headquarters of the National Federation remain the same.

Thus established and equipped, the National Federation of Churches enters upon its course as a new and promising factor in the thought, the life and activities of the Christian churches in America. Considering how well it is fitted by its constitution and avowed aims to meet certain positive and ever-increasing needs of the churches, one may come to hope for great and enduring benefit from this national federation, and predict that in the near future, state and town federations will be formed in every part of the United States, linked together by the national society. It may be pardoned for a large degree of optimism, when he thinks what a powerful a national federation may exert when it comes to voice the thought for the churches of America in behalf of public laws, of better citizenship, and of righteous causes.

How a Frontier Log-House Sunday School Grew

SEVERAL years ago, a volunteer missionary of the American Sunday School Union organized a little Union school in a log school-house in Michigan. It was one of many he had planted in the spiritually destitute frontier. On his way home from the school that night, and when just as he sighted the light in the window of his own home—a light placed there by a loving wife—his horse stepped off a bridge into the ravine, and he was so severely injured that he lived but a few days. God watched over that school which his servant had founded and blessed it. Perhaps the sudden death of the missionary aroused the school into unusual spiritual life.

Among the happy children brought into this school were four who one day came with their parents in an ox-team. Those four children were then all untaught of Christ's love for them, but they soon learned the Sunday School songs, committed the Golden Text to memory from Sunday to Sunday, and listened intently, as the teacher told of Jesus and his love. One after the other gave their hearts to Christ, till all were brought in. As time passed on, one of the older boys, then grown to young manhood, desired to enter the work of the American Sunday School Union as a missionary, and he was accepted. In the first year of his service he established 26 Sunday Schools, containing 720 scholars and teachers; he visited and aided 45 other schools needing help and encouragement; he sold and gave away literature to the value of $203.60 in places where good books and papers were scarce; he visited 1,124 families, many of them in sickness; he distributed Bibles and Testaments among those who had none and were unable to buy, and he gave 93 Sunday Schools talks and sermons.

A letter from one connected, who still with the original school, says: "The log house Sunday School is better than it ever was." Surely the possibilities for this school still widen out.

One of the missionaries of the society in Iowa came from a Union frontier school. A pastor of a church in western Nebraska, who was converted in one of its schools, served for a time as a volunteer missionary of the society. The church itself was the outgrowth of a Union Sunday School. These are not the only instances, but they serve to illustrate the phase of the American Sunday School Union's work, and to encourage alike supporters as well as the workers in the field. Over 1,800 schools were established in destitute places during the past year by the 100 missionaries of the Union. Any reader of this journal desiring information concerning this work may address Rev. E. P. Bancroft, secretary, 158 Fifth avenue, New York.

MINISTER WU TELLS OF CHINA'S GREAT FAMINE

The Chinese Minister at Washington Appeals to America to Help his Suffering Countrymen in Shansi and Shensi Provinces

ES, it is true, only too sadly true, I fear, that portions of my unhappy country are in the throes of a terrible famine," said His Excellency, Mr. Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister at Washington.

He was seated in the handsome parlors of the Legation, and made this reply to a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who had called upon him to inquire into the authenticity of an account of the famine in China, which had recently appeared in a New York paper. He read the clipping carefully, and added:

"I trust that this report is exaggerated. I sincerely hope that in some of its details, at least, it is, but I received advices from the Governor of Shensi yesterday which led me to fear that the conditions are appalling, heartrending in the extreme.

"What has caused the famine? Primarily, of course, that which always causes famine in any part of the world—drought and consequent failure of crops. But there are other things in this case which have aggravated the trouble, and augmented the usual horrors of famine. I refer to the Boxer uprising, and the state of affairs which has existed in certain provinces of the country since that occurred."

"Will you please tell me, Your Excellency, in what provinces the famine is prevailing and how large a territory they cover?"

24,000,000 Sufferers

The Provinces of Shensi and Shansi. They are in the northern part of the empire, and together occupy an area of more than 100,000 square miles. The population of Shensi is estimated at 10,000,000, and that of Shansi at 14,000,000. Shensi, which was, as you know, the ancient capital province of China for three thousand years, is where the Emperor, and the Empress Dowager, and the Court fled when they left Peking, and are still, pending the final action of the combined Powers.

"That the famine condition of Shensi aggravated by this fact cannot be doubted. At the least calculation, the Emperor's household and following must be five thousand persons, and while I have no way of knowing positively, yet I think it is a conservative estimate to place the number of soldiers who would be with them at twenty thousand. This makes twenty-five thousand more to feed daily than the usual residents of the province, and when you consider that for more than three years there has been a drought in that part of China, and that in consequence the crops have been completely cut off, you can understand in a measure what the famine must mean. And yet, unless you realize certain other things you will not be able to understand it fully.

Farmers the Victims

"First," the minister continued, "you must remember how inaccessible these provinces are. They are a thousand miles apart; there is practically no trade relations to speak of between them and the rest of the country or the outside world. The people are almost altogether farmers; they raise barely enough to supply their immediate wants year by year; but in the case of famine this supply is cut off, and there is no way to supplement it. No railway communication; scarcely any steamboat traffic, even on the river courses, and the coolie system that is utterly inadequate to meet the demands. When the crops fail, starvation always stares them in the face. Famine is not new in that part of China—unfortunately no; it is of frequent occurrence there, though perhaps never as bad before as it is now. This comes from its isolated position, and from the ignorance of the people more than anything else. When the crops fail in the southern part of China, rice, the main article of food, can be shipped in and the deficiency supplied; but in the interior of northern China it is very different, and the suffering is almost beyond belief.

"There is no reason for the famines which occur so frequently in this part of China—no reason which might not be prevented, and which, were it in this country, would be prevented. The great Hwang-ho, or 'Yellow River,' which flows between the two provinces, is a fabulously long river. I would not venture to tell you how long it is in all its course, lest you might think I was using my Oriental imagination. While, with proper irrigation, it might make that territory through which it flows the garden spot of the world for productiveness, yet its mighty volume of water rushes down from the mountains of Siberia, and almost every year causes desolating destruction to both life and property. So much is this true, that in the native

WU TING FANG
Chinese Minister at Washington

this time, is practically untouched. Doubtless, this seems absurd to you; but so deep-seated is this belief, that while for hundreds of years it has been known that the coal was there, it has never been mined.

"It is this same ignorance which has caused the feeling against foreigners. You can form but little conception of the conservatism of my people. For ages—long, long before this young republic was dreamed of—my people, in the ancient empire of China, were living along the same line of action which governs them to-day. The son was taught to reverence his father during his life-time and to continue his occupation after his death. He brought his wife to his father's home, generation after generation; there he lived, there he died; his highest ambition was that he might be buried in the tomb of his ancestors. That is as true now as it was a thousand years ago, and one thing that my countrymen have never been able to understand is why any man should care to leave his native place, much more his horrors of the famine could scarcely be overestimated, and begging me to appeal to the Chinese in America to send them help. The famine is in the northern provinces, and the winter is on, and to the pangs of hunger are now added the sufferings of cold. Upon the poor natives of Shensi the army of soldiers, the Court, and its attendants are quartered for an indefinite time.

"As things are now, the Court cannot return to Peking, and it must remain at the old capital. There is no food in the country around there, the long failure of the crops has swept it clean and dry of all products. Everything must be brought in on mule and coolie-back, and thousands must starve—even were the Government in a condition to give public help—before supplies can reach them.

An Appeal to America

"I have read of the wonderful generosity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to India during the famine in that country, and while I sincerely trust that the one in China may never be so great as that one, yet I feel very sure that should its kind patrons care to do a little for those who are now suffering so terribly in the Middle Kingdom, it would be appreciated far more than I can express. There is a sad misunderstanding amongst my countrymen at this time toward all foreigners, but they are seeing that the Americans intend to be fair and honorable. This was evidenced when General Chaffee was presented with a memorial the other day by certain Chinese officials. And were the people of the United States to send a gift, even a slight one, to the famine-stricken provinces, it would surely go a long way toward helping the Chinese to realize that the foreigners are not their enemies. I should be more than happy to transmit to the Governor of Shensi any communication, or send any assistance that might be raised for the famine sufferers."

ABBY G. BAKER.
Washington, D. C.

As requested by the Chinese Minister, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will accept and forward any contributions our readers may send to us for the sufferers in the famine, whose condition is so ably and feelingly described in Minister Wu's interview.

CHINESE RICE CULTIVATORS AT WORK IN THE FLOODED MEADOWS

tongue it is called 'The River of Sorrow.' Sometime, when my country has awakened to its own grand possibilities, this river will become one of the highways of commerce; but now it but adds to her troubles.

"In Shansi, the famine is fully as appalling as in Shensi, and yet, at but a little distance under the surface of the ground, there is as fine a mineral deposit as can be found in any country of the globe. When Baron von Richthofen made his examination of the minerals there, he gave it as his opinion that there was a deposit of coal beneath the surface sufficient to supply the markets of the world for a thousand years. It is one of the dogmas of the religion of China that it brings evil to any person who tunnels into the earth, and on account of that superstition this supply of coal, even at country, unless some imperative want makes it necessary.

China's Calamities

"I think that you can see how this state of affairs has wrought to bring about the trouble which has overtaken China in recent years. Oh! if we could but become modernized! If our rulers would but open our doors to progress! We have resources that would soon make famine and want a thing of the past, and our commerce would govern all eastern markets.

"And yet think of it," added Minister Wu, with a gesture of pain, "they are dying by hundreds this very morning for want of the barest necessities of life. I had a communication yesterday from the Governor of Shensi, telling me that the

Horses Carry a Heathen Bible

When Peking fell, a Buddhist priest named Kawakami, who had been to the temple before the recent troubles, following the rebellion of the Boxers and the massacres, at once repaired to it to inspect its treasures which he had not been allowed to look at previously.

The search revealed to him several valuable objects, of which the most remarkable was a complete set of Buddhist texts done into the Thibetan language. The volumes were of prodigious size; so prodigious, indeed, says the Japan Mail, that a pack-horse could only carry two or three volumes at a time, and as there were some 300 copies, their transportation all at once would require the services of at least a hundred horses.

Chapter I.—Blue Monday

WONDER if anything really lovely ever could happen to me?" asked a half-querulous, half-sad voice, as its owner cast herself despondently into the depths of a huge arm-chair which stood in the great bay-window, and flung her bag of school-books upon a table nearby. "I don't believe there could, and I don't care much, anyhow. Ugh! what a horrid day!" she continued, resting her elbows upon the cushioned arms of the chair and propping her chin upon her hands, as she looked out upon the cheerless prospect of leafless, dripping branches, a deserted, muddy street, and a steady November downpour. It would have been depressing, even if it could have been viewed from a cheerful room, by a bright, contented person; and it seemed doubly dreary when seen from a great barn-like one devoid of any attempt at ornamentation, or the touch of hominess which would have been its redeeming feature.

"Now, what am I to do all this afternoon, I'd like to know?" Study my lessons for to-morrow? That will take about one hour, and there are at least four; and then two more after dinner. Read? I'm so tired of reading that I almost wish I didn't have any books. I wonder if Aunt Matilda would let me sing some of mamma's old songs; they are so sweet that I don't believe they could disturb her. I'll ask her anyhow; she can only say 'No,' and I'm so used to that," and the young girl turned her face toward the room and rose listlessly from the chair.

As she did so, the door at the further end opened to admit a tall, rather handsome woman, with dark, glossy coils of hair upon her stately head, an almost colorless face, and great brown eyes; strange eyes, which stared straight before her, and yet made one look at them a second time before realizing that they were perfectly sightless.

Quite unaware that the room held any other occupant, she advanced with the peculiar halting step we so often see in the totally blind, and yet she seemed perfectly familiar with her surroundings and made her way to the table which stood at the window, opposite the one which still ensconced the young girl in its capacious depths, without coming in contact with any of the few articles of furniture which stood about. Laying upon it the letters she carried, she turned, with the evident intention of retracing her steps, but when about half way across the room, paused and stood in a listening attitude. The young girl had kept perfectly still, and yet the acute hearing of the blind woman must have detected some slight sound, for she turned the sightless eyes directly toward the chair, and said: "Marjorie, are you there?"

"Yes, Aunt Matilda," said the girl, as she ran across to where her aunt stood, and placed a hand on each shoulder, as she looked appealingly into the sightless eyes, which, could they have seen the look, must certainly have been touched by its longing.

"And, Aunt Matilda, I was just coming to ask you something when you opened the door. May I ask you now? and won't you please try to say 'Yes?'"

"I shall, of course, say 'Yes' if it is wise to, my dear, but you so often ask impossibilities that I do not care to commit myself."

"But this isn't an impossibility, Aunt Matilda, but something I should so love to do this miserable, rainy day."

"Is it raining? I was not aware of it," was the somewhat disinterested reply.

"Yes, it's just pouring, and I can't go out to see the girls, and I'm afraid you would not care to have me ask them here. Would you?" wistfully.

"Oh, no; I could not have any one here; it would disturb me terribly. But what is it you wish to do?"

"Please, auntie, may I open the piano in the music room and play and sing some of mamma's old songs? I'll do it very softly, and close the door, so that I need not disturb you."

"Oh, Marjorie! How can you ask such a thing? Don't you know it would break my heart to hear those ballads now? Remember, when I last heard them Made-line sang them and I accompanied her."

"No, Aunt Matilda, I don't remember, for I hardly remember mamma at all, you know; but I won't do it if you had rather I shouldn't," and the hands fell from their resting-place, as their owner turned sadly

As the young girl stands there in the middle of the room with her hands clasped idly before her and her sad eyes following the tall, stately figure, in the trailing black dress, it will perhaps be an opportune time in which to give a necessary word of explanation regarding her.

Marjorie Prior had just passed her fourteenth birthday, and was rapidly developing into a very lovely girl, for inheritance and nature were combining to give her all that was most desirable. From her mother, whom she scarcely remembered, came the sunny hair, beautiful brown eyes, lithe, graceful figure, and delicate hands and feet; while the firm mouth and chin, and fine teeth which her winning with all that was happiest in his disposition, and the old light-hearted, genial manner gave place to a settled quiet which nothing could dispel. He was devoted to his little daughter, and his manner toward her was invariably tender and affectionate; but she never regained the jolly plump fellow she had known before, and the little girl's life crept a shadow which threatened to change her whole character. There seemed but one person to fill her mother's place and this was Mrs. Prior's only sister, Matilda, who was a few years her senior, but not in the least like her. Matilda Carver and her sister had of been called "sunshine and shade," for the one seemed to see only the bright side of existence, while the other sought its shadow.

Perhaps it was a premonition of the futures, which also proved unlike; Mrs. Prior's was filled with joy and perfect happiness, while her sister's held great sorrow, which her extreme sensitiveness and intense pride rendered it all harder for her to bear. So Miss Carver came to fill the place in Dr. Prior's household now left vacant, and was soon established as mistress.

Undoubtedly she loved Marjorie dearly, but her intense aversion of showing any feeling made her swing to the opposite extreme, and the little girl sorely missed the tender caresses the sweet beautiful mother had so lavished upon her, and could not understand the change.

Marjorie clung all the closer to her father, who tried to fill the mother's place and who suffered doubly in realizing that he never could. It was fortunate that Marjorie's disposition was naturally sunny one, or she never could have reached her fifteenth year and retained any of her girlish nature.

When she was ten, her aunt met with a serious accident which cost her her eyesight, and it seemed the last straw to complete her misery. She at once set herself up in the home and would see absolutely no one. In vain friends called only to be told by the old butler that "Miss Carver begged to be excused."

As time went on the house lost its home-like appearance; for in her helplessness Miss Carver dreaded to have anything she might accidentally strike and destroy, and gradually one article after another was relegated to the storeroom or safe, and all unnecessary articles of furniture were carried to the unused rooms on the third story. Even the curtains must be removed from the windows lest by some mysterious means they catch fire. Indeed, poor Miss Carver became absolutely morbid, and did not realize that in her affliction she was growing self-centered and making her niece's life wretched.

Marjorie was never allowed to bring any of her school friends home, nor entertain them in any way if it must be done in the house. True, she had a great deal of liberty and could visit them where she chose. But that was a one-sided pleasure at best, and she longed with most intense longing to have a home like the other girls and bring into it her friends she loved.

Dr. Prior was so occupied with his practice that he gave little thought to that side of the question, and his special sanctum and study was left exactly as his idolized wife had arranged it him nine years before.

But I must no longer leave poor Marjorie standing in the middle of the cheerless sitting room, with that forlorn, hopeless look upon her pretty face.

With a sigh which ought certainly have reached the stoniest heart, she turned back to her chair, and taking her bag of school-books began her algebra lesson for the following day.

Before the hour was ended the front door opened, and her father came into the room where she sat working.

away and the beautiful brown eyes, which had looked so appealingly into the blind ones, filled with unshed tears.

"Why don't you read, my dear? I'm sure you have an endless number of books, and I cannot imagine a more delightful occupation," and a deep sigh told how intense was her own longing to read.

"I am tired of reading, auntie, but,"—and the tone changed to one of eagerness—"may I read aloud to you? I'd love to, and I'm sure you would enjoy the new book of Mrs. Stewart's stories that Uncle Lloyd sent me. I've read only one, but it was lovely."

"I think your father has read them all to me, and as I am rather tired, I will ask you to excuse me, my dear, for I wish to lie down," and she passed from the room, leaving behind her a beautiful young face, but such a sad one that it was perhaps as well that her misfortune prevented her from seeing it.

smile disclosed, spoke of the genial, handsome father. When Marjorie was but six years of age the lovely mother had gone from the dear home never to return, and had left behind her an almost heart-broken husband and very desolate little daughter, whom she had nearly idolized, and who thought "mamma" absolutely perfect.

Up to that time the child's life had been all that a child's life should be: joyful, happy, and perfectly free from any depressing influence. In her father's and mother's love for each other and for herself, she saw all that was best and sweetest in this world; and in their wise control of herself learned, young as she was, that something is due to others, and a great deal to those we love and who love us.

But her sunshine was soon dimmed by clouds which almost seemed to grow heavier each year, for when her father recovered from the first shock of his wife's death he seemed to have parted

GOLDEN TEXT. Matt. 26: 45:

"The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners"

By...
Dr. and Mrs.
Wilbur F. Crafts

LONG ago and far away, a baby boy came to the home of a man named Simon, in a village called Kerioth. His parents were so glad and so grateful to God, and so hopeful he would be great and good, that they gave him a name meaning "the praise of God." Perhaps you have heard the Oratorio of Creation, and remember the chorus repeats, in loudest strains, "the praise of God, the praise of God, THE PRAISE OF GOD." That was the way his parents felt. His mother probably sang as did Hannah, when God gave her little Samuel (1. Sam. 2: 1-10); such a song as Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, sang at his birth (Luke 1: 67-79). How fondly his parents watched his growth; his first word, his first step! With what joy his mother taught him his bed-time prayer, and took him to church and to school! Her day-dreams, as she watched her boy at his play, she pictured him grown to stalwart manhood, beloved and honored for his goodness. And she whispered the words, suggested by his name, that had been said of his great grandfather and namesake, "Thou art whom thy brethren shall praise." "We shall be so proud of him," she would say aloud to her husband, as if her loving dream were a divine prophecy that could not fail of fulfillment.

What he was to be! Let us each recall our own parents' hope and prayer for us, as expressed in the names we bear. What were the excellences of the man or woman after whom you were named? Those, your parents, looking with hope into your innocent baby face, prayed that you might have. Perhaps your mother named you Luther, or John Kix, praying you might be as fearless as the lion in doing and saying the right, whoever might threaten or oppose. No one names his child after one famed for cowardice or covetousness or hypocrisy. Look over the newspaper roll of criminal names for the last week and see how many, whose names proclaim their parents' high hopes, have dishonored some noble name. Alas, and you, living up to your name—helping God answer your mother's prayer?

That name which once meant praise now stands for perfidy—Judas. Of his whose mother was filled with pride at his birth, Jesus said, "It were better for that man if he had never been born." What he was to be! What he was! How sad the contrast in many a life! You may not be a Judas, but are you what your parents dreamed and hoped you might be? Remember, too, that Judas did not become the wickedest man in the world all at once. The "root" of the treason which he at last committed eternal suicide was covetousness. No one ever pleads guilty to that. The drunkard often confesses that he is such; but the miser, never. Perhaps you will admit that you are somewhat selfish, less devoted to the good of others, to bettering and brightening the greed-cursed world, than your mother's ideal or your own in generous youth. Let us revive those ideals before the blight of Judas has become too strong to escape. If there were no hereafter, which life is the happier, the nobler, the worthier, that of Judas, dominated by selfishness, or that of John, the embodiment of love to God and man?

"Mother," said little Charlie, "Will Helen say his mother writes books. Is it very hard to write a book?" "I don't know," said the busy mother. "I'm going to write a book," said Charlie. Just then the mother went to the door to see a caller, and when she came back in a few moments Charlie said: "I've done my book." "No," said his mother, "you are not done. God has given you a book to write. I hope it is a long one, full of beautiful stories. The name of it is 'Charlie's Life.' You can write only one page a day, and you must be careful not to spoil the pages by doing ugly, naughty, selfish things. When you help mother and do right, that makes a page. With a beautiful picture and a sweet story. By and by an angel will shut the book, and God will open it on a great day when all the books are opened."

Long before Judas wrote those blood-red pages of murder and suicide, he had been plying in lesser stains, of selfishness and meanness. "Every man for himself" was written long before his crimes, and prepared the way for them.

We shall miss the most important teaching in the tragedy of Judas, whose last pages, stained with murder and suicide, we are now about to turn, if we do not clearly recognize that his great crimes were not reached at a bound, but by a slow descent, as of a ladder rolled by round. "We pity him all along, for he is represented as wholly and irredeemably bad but only as a man who has no faith and no enthusiasm. It is the case described by Shakespeare: "The man that hath no music in himself," who, for lack of imaginative qualities, is "fit for treason, stratagems and spoils." All the apostles had followed Christ, partly because they thought he was the Messiah, who would not only deliver the nation from the Romans, but also provide his chief followers with lucrative offices. Peter said to Christ: "We have left all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" But selfishness in the other apostles was not allowed to become a ruling passion, as it became in Judas. Other apostles might be thought love-blind. This heartless witness could not be accused of being carried away by "sentiment." Judas worked his plans to get the office of treasurer, probably not admitting yet, even to himself, that he would misappropriate the funds for the poor. Having the money in hand, he stole (John 12: 6), but so prudently that none but Christ knew it, or he would have been dismissed. When Mary of Bethany poured upon the feet of Christ spikenard of value equal to a year's wages, it was to the covetous soul of Judas as if someone had snatched so much gold out of his own hand. And when his criticism of the "waste" was also condemned by Christ it was like a second stab to the heart. His dishonesty and insincerity made him the more sensitive. A man does not "get mad" at a rebuke when there is no truth in it. Still, for three days Judas does not consummate the betrayal, which at first he only dares to think. There was, no doubt, many a battle with conscience. He probably said to himself that he had been deceived in thinking Christ would have earthly rewards to give, and was justified in making what he could while taking revenge also for the rebuke. He perhaps argued that Christ would use his miraculous powers to save himself, so that no real harm would be done, and he would have the money. And so hesitating, yet dragged on revolt and a change in the Government of Rome, or his own execution. He made his choice and crossed, and became ruler of the world. Christ knew in crossing the Cedron that he was going both to the cross and the conquest of the world. For the joy set before him in the world's redemption he accepted the cross, despising the shame.

Judas also knew the place.—What masterpieces of hypocrisy we see in this whole proceeding! The chief priests of a most punctilious religion plot a murder, in which the ringleader is to be an apostle, who, with crime in his heart, piously eats the Passover, and then leads the "temple police," with Roman soldiers also, to Christ's well known place of secret prayer. Nor is it probable that the priests were conscious of any hypocrisy or inconsistency. Even Judas, we may be sure, had some excuse which he then thought sufficient. Therefore, let no one to-day suppose he may not be committing some treachery because he is not conscious of it.

Let these go their way. What a sublime picture of the true nobility of unselfishness this is in contrast with the supreme covetousness of Judas! As the great company of Roman soldiers and tem-confidence, had boasted, when told he would deny Christ, "I will go with thee to prison and to death." And he did show just a little flash of courage. As he saw the Judas crowd coming again upon Christ, he seized

"SO THE OFFICERS SEIZED HIM AND BOUND HIM"

"WHAT ARE YE WILLING TO GIVE ME AND I WILL DELIVER HIM UNTO YOU?"

by his love of money, he went on Wednesday to the plotting priests. Why did they give so little—only the price of a slave—thirty-five-cent dollars? Was it not because Judas could give them nothing but Christ's body—no proof of fraud or sin by which they could kill his claims to be the Messiah with the multitudes that believed in him. No doubt Judas remembered the treachery of his ancestor in selling Joseph into slavery as the slave price was offered him, but the clink of the coin was the sound of his chain, the chain of covetousness in which he had become entrapped, and which would soon drag him to his death, like the magnificent eagle, born to soar above the mountain, dragged within range of a hunter's rifle by a steel trap in which his foot had become entangled.

This lesson presents—

1. The fruit of covetousness in Judas.
2. The unselfishness of Christ.
3. The folly and fear of the apostles.

He went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron.—Julius Cæsar, the military commander of a province only, marching toward Rome, paused at the Rubicon, the boundary of his command. To cross it would mean ple officers march into Gethsemane with Judas at their head, Jesus, strengthened by prayer and angel ministries, steps forth and says: "Whom seek ye?" They answer: "Jesus, the Nazarene." To which he replied fearlessly: "I am he." And then, as if to show them he could yet save himself if he would, he causes those who seek his life to fall back and fall down. But he did not wish to save his life or destroy the life of others, and so yielded to arrest after making this display of miraculous power. But in sacrificing himself he sought to save his apostles, saying: "If ye seek me, let these go their way." This spirit of Christ, forgetting ourselves while we seek to help others, was beautifully illustrated in the story of the newsboy who supported a lame brother that "couldn't earn much himself," as the newsboy explained to a kind old gentleman who asked about his home. "Ah! that makes it hard," said the gentleman. "You could do better alone." "No, I couldn't. Jim's somebody to go home to; he's lots of help. What would be the good of having luck, if nobody was glad? Or of getting things, if there was nobody to divide with."

Put up thy sword. Peter, in undue self-a sword, and with one badly-aimed blow cut off the ear of Malchus, a servant of the High Priest. Again Christ showed his miraculous power in healing this wound, an act of spontaneous kindness to his foes that would even then have proved to them his claims, but that hatred and envy had put out the eyes of their souls. Then he turned in rebuke to Peter, and said—and the words have wide application to all who seek to hasten Christ's kingdom by war—"Put up thy sword." Gethsemane and Calvary both prove that love is mightier than soldiers for real conquest of the world.

But Peter's courage was but a blaze and not a fire. He and all the other apostles a moment later forsook Christ and fled. In discussing the larger sin of covetousness let us not overlook this yet more common and hardly less harmful sin of cowardice, found so often even among sincere disciples, whenever to follow Christ seems to involve loss or peril. We are getting many a story of courage in the face of death on the part of the native converts in China during the recent massacres by the Boxers. Here is one, told by J. Fred Hayner: The Boxers had caught two native Christian boys and dragged them to the temple, determined to make them "kotow," that is, bow to the idols on penalty of death. "Kotow, or I'll kill you," said a fierce Boxer, and the larger boy of fourteen, frightened at the big knives, took the censer and waved it before the idol. As he bent to kneel the younger boy of eleven said aloud, "Aren't you ashamed of yourself?" "You, too," blurted another Boxer. "Not I. The foreign preacher taught us better. 'Twould be an insult to the God who made us, to worship that clay idol.'" The Boxer, enraged, made a lunge at the little fellow but missed his mark, and another Boxer shouted, "Hold on a minute. Let us keep the big one for our coolie work and let the little fellow go." The boy was then released, and later, in joining the fugitives fleeing to Tientsin, said with a modesty to match his courage, "I wasn't big enough to do their coolie work and so they let me go." But the other part of the story was told by another, who had been in the crowd at the temple. The story should rebuke us who are silent from cowardice when we ought to speak for Christ.

Although the last acts in the tragedy of Judas are not in this lesson, we may well complete the story. When he saw Christ finally delivered over to death, he repented with keen remorse, and came to the chief priests and declared he had "betrayed innocent blood," throwing down the awful bribe of betrayal at their feet when they refused to take it in their hands. These very religious murderers were too conscientious to put "this price of blood" into the church treasury, and so bought a potter's field with it. Meantime Judas had hanged himself by his girdle to a tree, and, falling headlong, had burst asunder, his bowels gushing out, a horrible and fitting picture of his inner life.

THIRTY YEARS OF EFFORT AMONG WORKING-WOMEN

...SPLENDID RECORD OF THE NEW YORK Y. W. C. A.
BY ADELIA M. McNAME

JUST thirty years ago, in 1870, the Young Women's Christian Association of New York City came into existence. It owed its birth to the conviction in the minds of a few Christian ladies that some better provision should be made for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the working-women of New York, even then numbering nearly 200,000. As its first headquarters, the association occupied a few rooms in a house on a quiet street. It had a small Bible Class, a library consisting of a few hundred volumes, an Employment Bureau, a Board Directory, and one Sewing Class. The contrast between that beginning and the Association as it is to-day is very striking and yet most natural. It occupies a large and commodious building at No. 7 East Fifteenth street, and is splendidly equipped for its work in every department. Its officers are: President, Mrs. Clarence E. Beebe; First Vice-President, Miss M. A. Stimson; Second Vice-President, Mrs. Elliot F. Shepard; Third Vice-President, Mrs. R. A. Dorman; Treasurer, Mrs. G. L. Elliott; Assistant Treasurer, Mrs. G. F. Butterworth; Corresponding Secretary, Miss J. F. Bangs, and Recording Secretary, Mrs. Robert Jaffray, Jr.

Perhaps the work of the Society may be best described by devoting a paragraph to each separate branch, so that the reader may form a correct idea of the size and scope of the Young Women's Christian Association, and what it stands for in New York City. The Bible Class, meeting Sunday afternoons and Tuesday evenings, has an average attendance of 500. Its members, who need help and advice, enjoy the personal ministration of Miss Doheny, chaplain of the association. She has also under her charge the relief work for the sick and needy, the Traveler's Aid Work, which means the care of unprotected girls passing through the maelstrom of this city; the Fresh Air Fund, which gives to many a taste of country life during the heated term, and the Summer School, which offers a safe and agreeable place of resort and instruction to women and girls on the hot summer evenings. In the association parlors they find classes for Bible study, physical culture, millinery, embroidery, and singing, and they are made welcome to numerous entertainments and festivals. Among the visitors last summer were 1,432 girls under twenty-one who had never crossed the threshold of the association before.

The Committee on Education and Entertainment has under its supervision 133 classes during the winter term of eight months. For these classes there is a corps of twenty-one teachers, and the pupils number over 2,000. Instruction is given in bookkeeping, business training, choir music, commercial arithmetic, cooking, cooking for invalids, drawing (mechanical and freehand), photo-color, and re-touching, photo-negatives, water-color, modeling, instrumental drawing, color and special branches, general literature, elementary dressmaking, repairing and altering, embroidery, cutting and fitting, finishing, machine and hand-sewing, millinery, feather-curling, penmanship, physical culture, stenography, typewriting and nursing. A nominal fee is charged in every class, except in those for general literature, choir music, and physical culture. Instruction in all the classes is of a practical nature, and insures the obtaining of good business positions. This committee provides monthly entertainments of a high order, which are free to all associate members. Any self-supporting woman may become an associate member on payment of one dollar per year. The Free Circulating Library for self-supporting women has 28,920 volumes on its shelves, 5,652 women enrolled as readers, and an annual circulation of 92,801.

The Employment Bureau is open to any woman resident in New York City who can furnish good references for character and ability. Associate members have free use of the Bureau. Other applicants pay a fee of fifty cents for six months' registration. Last year the Bureau found positions for 2,500 applicants. The Needle-Work Committee maintains an order department for children's clothing and general family sewing. There is also a salesroom, where all varieties of women's work are sold for the benefit of the consigners. The Board Directory finds suitable homes for women seeking board and lodging in New York City. To applicants for rooms no fee is charged. During 1900, 8,147 applicants were provided for. This directory has also charge of the seaside summer home of the association at Asbury Park, N. J. At this home, Protestant self-supporting women (except those in household service) are received at the rate of $10 for two weeks, or $6 for one week, cost of transportation included. During the summer of 1900, 226 visitors were entertained.

For many years, it was through the Board Directory alone that the association could provide for the women who came to its doors seeking city accommodation; but in 1891 the beautiful Margaret Louise Home, at Nos. 14 and 16 East Sixteenth street, the gift to the Young Women's Christian Association of Mrs. Elliot F. Shepard and named for its founder, was opened for guests. The Home is thoroughly equipped in modern style, and here a woman who seeks temporary board and lodging may obtain both. From eighty-five to one hundred guests can be accommodated daily. Since the opening of the Home, 54,000 have been admitted. Of these 18,000 have been teachers, and professionals and business women of every variety make up the rest. In connection with the Home, a restaurant serves, upon an average, 314,000 meals a year. These meals are wholesome, inexpensive, and so meet the need of thousands of women who must practice the strictest economy.

This is but a brief statement of the growth and achievement of the association since it began its career so quietly, thirty-one years ago. Every year has grown to the Young Women's Christian Association wider opportunities, greater responsibilities and larger vitality. It feels every part of its great organization, the spirit of the times, with which it keeps abreast, and its aim may be as simply expressed as in those early days. It seeks to uplift spiritually and to aid materially the working women of New York.

The West Side Settlement is another shoot of the association, which, although flourishing in quite a different neighborhood, is still an integral part of the work which has its headquarters in Fifteenth street. The Settlement was started in 1881 in a house at 453 West Forty-seventh street. The need of Association work among the children of that densely populated season could not be ignored, and so an enterprise was begun, which, in the sequel, has been greatly blessed. The house in Forty-seventh street has proved to be small for the needs of the Settlement, which is to be immediately transferred to a larger and more convenient building at Nos. 458 and 460 West Forty-fourth street. The association has no endowment, and depends for its revenue upon donations and subscriptions, the purchase of this house entails a heavy burden. It is hoped that at this juncture, the friends of the association may be moved to give some much needed aid.

At the new house will reside the Settlement workers, who, under the direction of a committee of association members, carry on a work of very varied description. A home is provided at low rates for girls earning from $3 to $4 per week. There are millinery, feather-curling and dress-maker's training classes at moderate charges. Additional classes for kindergarten, city history singing, gymnastics, sewing, cooking and wood-carving are maintained, and mothers' receptions are held once a month. The Settlement has a Penny Provident Fund, with 3,448 depositors, and a free circulating library, with 2,257 readers. During the summer, an active fresh air work is carried on. Best of all, it has been clearly demonstrated that the leaven of the Settlement's influence is working for good through the whole neighborhood; that old, as well as young, are being reached, and that a light has been set to burn, where it illumines darkness caused more by ignorance and incapacity than by actual poverty.

THE WEDDING OF QUEEN WILHELMINA

THESE are merry times in Holland, for the echoes of Wilhelmina's wedding bells have hardly died away. Was this date Hague ever before so gay with bravery of silken banners, pennants of silver and gold, streamers and festoons of red, and orange and white and blue, as during that joyous first week of February, when the Dutch folk tried to see how happy they could make their little queen and how happy she could be themselves at her marriage fete? Thousands of green arches and green wreaths powdered with snow added to the quaint capital charm. Among green leaves gleamed golden ornaments; everybody wore ribbons or rosettes of orange; even honest dogs dragging mail-carts were loyally tricked out in the royal color. Merry-makers kept holiday under flags and arches; choirs of sweet-voiced street singers mingled melody; where brass bands came along playing the national air, the populace caught it up in chorus. Orange-clad harlequins with tinkling bells, made mirth alike for lowly folk and stately dukes and princes.

Occasionally," wrote a visitor at the Hague the day before the marriage, "Queen Wilhelmina and Prince Henry drive past in an open sleigh-cage. Their approach is heralded by mounted officers. Then follows a scene of tumult, men, women and children, most of them in wooden shoes, rushing pell-mell for the line of march. Their clothing gets torn, their hats are lost, and amid a mighty shouting the Queen sweeps by, bowing and laughing." The Queen would not have her good country-folk, who had come from far and near to her wedding, interfered with or kept too strenuously away from her, and the police had little to do.

With her betrothed beside her, Her Majesty reviewed, from the balcony of her historic palace, a procession of workmen, 4,000 strong. Unbonneted, she stood in the stinging air, a pretty, girlish vision, with rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes, smiling down upon paraders, and the joyous crowd which came trooping after them, holding hands, shouting and laughing like children. Later, the pair drove to Scheveningen, where the fisherfolk, to whom she has shown great generosity and affection, had erected triumphal arches of nets, oars, barrels and other paraphernalia of their calling. Princely representatives of great Powers were at the Hague to do her honor; and rich gifts from emperors, kings and nobles were showered upon the young pair. But the feature of this wedding which one loves most to dwell upon, was the tribute of lowly folk. Neat presents from the people of Holland, gifts showing the handiwork of humble housewives throughout the kingdom, were pouring in for weeks. The civil marriage on the morning of February 7, was followed by the religious ceremony in the old church which the Queen has attended since she was a little girl, and in spite of the splendid company assembled to witness it, it was as simple as that which unites any Dutch maiden to her lover.

It was a beautiful picture when the blue curtains parted, and, preceded by a brilliant procession, the Queen came forth in trailing robes of silver tissue threaded with pearls, her fair head crowned with jewels and orange blossoms, her hands full of flowers. Beside her was her stalwart lover in a Dutch admiral's uniform. A choir of many voices greeted them with, "Blest be your earthly and eternal portion."

and you see how they rejoice with you today, praying God that all possible happiness may be your portion. Your happiness will reach further than your household." After the young pair themselves, the two figures of greatest interest at this marriage were the Queen-Mother and Prince Henry's mother, who stood watching with smiles and tears, while their children entered into life's most solemn compact. Wilhelmina's relations with her mother recall those between Victoria and hers, as this marriage recalls Victoria's marriage. May Holland's Prince Consort be as England's was.

Wilhelmina is the "Peace Queen"—the first monarch in whose realm a great Peace Conference was held—and all the nations have reason to wish her joy and peace!

Exploring the Bed of the Sea

IN TENSE interest has been aroused by the reports of the recent German expedition to the Southern Pacific. Many problems deeply interesting to scientists have been solved and many theories once held and taught have been proved erroneous by actual test. One of these was that animal life ceased at a comparatively small depth, while it is now known that even as far down as four thousand feet the ocean is teeming with life. The Valdivia, the German vessel used by the expedition, was equipped with the latest and most approved machinery—a wonderful advance on the instruments used in the Challenger expedition, which in its turn was vastly superior to the old dredges. The result has been the discovery of new specimens, both animal and vegetable, that have been the wonder and delight of naturalists everywhere. It was also found that the temperature of the ocean depths is very variable. Sometimes it is warmer down there than in the air above, but more frequently colder. There is also a great difference in the temperature of different seas. The contrivance used for registering the temperature so that the thermometer should not be affected by its passage from the ocean bed to the surface, is very ingenious. The Southern Pacific has now added materially to our knowledge of life on the globe. The discoveries of M. Borchgrevink, who spent whole winter in the Antarctic, and of Dr. Gerloche, who was frozen in for several months, which were spent in scientific observation, have rendered the last year of the nineteenth century a memorable one in scientific research. Probably never before has there been so conspicuous a fulfilment of the Psalmist's declaration:

They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters; these see the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep (Ps. 107: 23).

A Plague of Spiders

A scientific journal reports that telegraphic communication in the Argentine Republic has been seriously impeded, and at times almost entirely interrupted, by the work of spiders. The spiders spin their webs across the telegraph lines, and as soon as dew falls or a shower comes up, every microscopic thread with which the wires abound becomes wet, and establishes a minute leak. The effect of millions of these leaks is practically to stop the operation of the lines. The government telegraph department, especially in Buenos Ayres, has been put to much inconvenience. A number of expedients have been tried, but to no purpose. On the important line between Buenos Ayres and Rosario the effect of the webs is to cut down the speed of working from three or four hundred messages an hour to thirty. It is believed that the only effectual remedy is to put all the wires underground, which, of course, will involve a heavy expense. It is significant that so small and despised a creature should be able to cause such an interruption to public communication, but small causes often lead to disastrous results. Many a Christian has learned by sad experience that some sin that he regards as trivial, interrupts both his communion with God and his usefulness among men.

Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth (James 3: 5).

Coffin and Tombstone Ready

A man who died in a village in New York State a few days ago had made unusual preparations for the end of his life. He had never married, and had always lived in a cottage by himself. Twenty years ago, he being then fifty-eight years of age, and in good health, surprised an undertaker by the request that he be measured for his coffin. He was very particular as to the kind of wood to be used, the material for the lining, etc. Eventually it was completed to his satisfaction, and it was set up in his living room and covered with oilcloth. Two years afterwards he made further preparation for the end by ordering a gravestone, a stone coping and a slab for the foot of the grave. His name, the date of his birth, and the inscription in Latin: "He rests in peace," were inscribed on the headstone, with a vacant place for the date of his death. He pledged his friends to use the coffin and gravestone, and they will see that his wish is carried out. The articles have been in his house ever since they were supplied, and must have been a constant reminder to the solitary man of the sternation, he found that there was nothing nearer than Pictairn Island, and that was 2,600 miles away. The vessel was immediately headed for the island, though few on board had any hope of reaching it. Happily, however, the vessel was of steel, and the sailors were set to work stopping every crevice by which the air could reach the fire. The deck became so hot that it was necessary to keep it flooded with water, so that the men could walk on it. Soon the food ran short, for no one could go below to get supplies, because of the intense heat. The crew were put on half rations, and all bent their efforts to increasing the speed of the ship. Toward the end of this awful voyage, which lasted seventeen days, the roar of the approaching end of his long life. We may hope that a man who had made such careful provision for his body, had not forgotten the need of preparation for the welfare of his soul. There are only too many who remember the one, which is of little importance, and neglect the latter, which is of infinite moment:

If the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies (Rom. 8: 11).

A Race with Fire

A steamer from Tahiti reached San Francisco on February 6, with a crew on board, who had passed through a thrilling experience. They sailed from Tacoma for Leith, Scotland, with a cargo of wheat on board. They had been out at sea nearly a month, when it was found that the cargo was on fire. The crew worked hard to get it under control, but it had gained too much headway before it was discovered. Then the hatches were battened down, and the captain took an observation to find out the nearest land. To his con-flames could be distinctly heard on deck. As the men listened they looked at one another with blanched faces. Never had they been so glad to see the land as they were on the seventeenth morning after the discovery of the fire, when the lookout announced the welcome sight. The vessel was run on the beach, and the crew remained there until the San Francisco steamer arrived and took them on board. Many a man's life resembles that voyage. The forces of evil in his nature keep him in constant danger, and he has to struggle and exercise perpetual vigilance to keep himself from being overcome. Happily, in all such cases, help is assured to him if he will avail himself of it, and he is promised a haven of safety at the end of his course.

He that endureth to the end shall be saved (Matt. 10: 22).

A Village Destroyed

A terrible mining disaster is reported from Mexico. It was in the San Andres silver mine in the Sierra Madres. This is one of the richest silver mines in the country. Though ore worth millions of dollars has already been taken out of it, its value is estimated at more than twenty millions. In one of the subterranean chambers of the mine several hundred cases of dynamite were stored. Through the room ran the electric wires communicating with the hoisting apparatus and the remote parts of the mine. It is supposed that the wires must in some way have crossed, producing sparks which fired the dynamite. Suddenly, without warning, there was an explosion in the dynamite chamber which shook the surrounding country. The village in which many of the miners lived was on the mountain plateau, directly over the mine. It was utterly devastated. Many of the houses were shaken down, while others were crushed by boulders which the shock brought down from the top of the mountain. About one hundred persons lost their lives, many of them being mangled beyond the possibility of recognition. The keeping of the dynamite in a room through which electric wires passed was surely imprudent. An agent so destructive ought always to be kept where no spark can reach it. Moral and spiritual disasters often come from a disregard of such precautions. It is not possible to wholly avoid the temptations which appeal to the evil within the heart, but every one who is conscious of the existence of the evil, should be careful to avoid unnecessary exposure.

Enter not into the path of the wicked and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it and pass away (Prov. 4: 14).

An Immigrant's Gratitude

A policeman in New York was surprised last week by his wife informing him that she was an heiress. His post lies near the Battery, and he has been patrolling in that neighborhood for nearly thirty years. Twenty-seven years ago an immigrant bricklayer landed at Castle Garden. He had no friends, and when he left the shelter he asked the policeman to direct him to a boarding-house. He did so, and the next day had further talk with him. He took an interest in the man and obtained employment for him from a builder who was a friend of his own. But the Bricklayers' Union objected to him because he was not a member, so he was discharged. But the policeman secured his election to the Union, paying the fees out of his own pocket. His protegee speedily reimbursed him and seemed grateful. After a time he prospered and went West, and the policeman heard no more of him. Not until last week did he know whether he was alive or dead. Then news came that he had died and had made the policeman's wife his sole heiress. It is not thought that he left a large sum, but he bequeathed her all he had. Evidently the policeman's kindness to him in his need had made a deep impression on his mind. It is not often that such kindness is rewarded in this world, but Christ assured us that when it is done to one of his followers in his name the reward in heaven is sure.

Whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you he shall not lose his reward (Mark 9: 41).

BRIEF NOTES

A remarkable work of grace is in progress at Bay City, Mich., following the labors of Dr. L. W. Munhall. At one of the services more than two hundred persons, the majority of them young people, pledged themselves to Christ.

It is reported that Dr. A. C. Dixon who has so long ministered to the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., has accepted the pastorate of the Ruggles Street Church, Boston, Mass. His departure will be deeply lamented by the Brooklyn church.

Dr. Teunis Hamilton, of Washington, D. C., has at last had the gratification of dedicating the beautiful Church of the Covenant. The Church has been used for thirteen years, but its dedication was postponed until the debt of $75,000 upon it was removed. The last dollar has now been paid and the church is dedicated.

IN THE LONG WINTER NIGHTS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Boy's Evenings

THE boy whose days are spent in a business office and who comes home tired at night, does not always want to go to an evening school. Yet there is probably no better thing, in view of his promotion and his future, for any lad, than to learn all he can, to improve in his handwriting and arithmetic, and to add to his stock of information. If a boy wishes advancement he will study even if he is tired at the day's end. He may take up French, or German, or Spanish, any one of which languages is very valuable in business in these days, when all countries are held together by commercial intercourse. If the boy does not care for study he may be interested in games, in the reading of stories of adventure and heroism, and in music. A zither, a mandolin, or a banjo, is a very good possession for a boy, even though he does little beyond strumming upon them. The boy who spends his evenings in idling on the street, in hanging around theatre doors, or near saloons, or in low company of any kind, is in great danger of forming associations which will injure his whole life. His familiarity with vice on its edges may easily draw him deeper into the whirlpool. The terrible catastrophes which shock society from time to time, the wreckage of young men who were born to better things, and not handicapped by criminal heredity, are startling flashlights on the amazing and frightful peril of ill-spent evenings.

The country boy and the city boy are equally threatened by the temptations of the tavern and the saloon. Once initiated into the evils which lurk behind the bar, into the profanity and vulgarity there, and into the superficial atmosphere of good fellowship which Satan throws around his victims, the boy's descent is swift and easy.

Fathers and mothers cannot be held guiltless if they do not keep a vigilant eye on their sons after nightfall. The period between fifteen and twenty-one is a trying time for youth, and they do not need so much a tight rein as a nice hand on the bridle. Suggestion is better than command. A dull, dark, gloomy home is so full of lurking seeds of ill, that it is responsible for the downfall of many a boy.

There is another matter, too, on which parents are strangely silent, sheering off from it as though its mere mention were gross and shocking, while yet their boys cannot take up a daily paper, nor walk a city street without having it thrust upon their attention. The relations of the sexes, reverence for the body and for its every function, and the regard for purity which is as incumbent on man as on woman, are seldom spoken of in the home, though parents owe it to their children to give them right training here, just as they do in regard to other matters of morality. The eighth commandment is not more imperiously binding than the seventh, and any infraction of the latter is as sure of immediate penalty and reprisal as of the former. In very early days mothers should explain to their children the laws of the physical life, and fathers owe an obligation to their sons to watch over them carefully, and to give them right principles, and the protection of knowledge before they go out into a world bristling with Apollyon's darts and crowded with his emissaries.

Society, for its own advantage, needs a high standard of ethics among the young. Back of society stands the home. Guardians of the home are the parents. Whatever else they overlook, whatever they bequeath, whatever they endow their children with, let them not fail to bring them up in the fear of God, and in respect for his law.

A boy is educated not by schools and teachers only. And as in many of our schools there is no direct religious training, a boy is often, in this Christian land, allowed to grow up as a pagan. Few sons of Christian homes read the Bible daily as a duty—they read, if at all, the Sunday of hope, for a better day is coming, and already its dawn brightens the Eastern sky. As we learn to make Christlikeness our desire, and to ask "What would Jesus do?" every day, we shall help to bring in that better time.

Sleeping With the Old

Do not, if you can possibly help yourself, put little Lottie in her grandmother's bed. Old people have lessened vitality. They draw from that of the young. A child who sleeps with an old or feeble person will be pallid and languid. It is best for people to sleep alone, that is, for every young individual to have a bed by him or herself. Two beds or three may be in a nursery if the room be large and well ventilated.

The Birthday Month

February enjoys the rare distinction of having two holidays, each celebrating the birth of a very great man. Lincoln and Washington, two whose names are forever starred with glory, both saw the light first in this hero month.

A FAMILY SCHOOL

The children are brothers, sisters and cousins, and they meet every day in Miss Caroline's room, and have school from nine until twelve. Eva and Marguerite are learning to knit, Gerald has a picture book, Teddy is drawing on his slate, and Dorothy has a lesson to learn. Sweet little Angie is doing a sum. All the children are happy and busy, and Miss Caroline tells them stories, and often, after recess, gives them pretty marching exercises, or lets them sing. This is a very lovely family school, and a type of many others in humble homes.

School lesson; and the Sunday School, the Christian Endeavor Society, and the several brotherhoods, guilds, and leagues do what they can to save the boys. But direct religious training is needed in the home, and some portion of the home evening, if only ten minutes before bedtime, should be devoted to Bible reading and to prayer. It is very hard for a boy to get away from the influence of his mother's prayers. The mother, kneeling at the bedside, the low murmured petition to the present, loving, living Saviour, how much good this does only heaven can tell.

The Lives of the Working People

We cannot shut our eyes to the hardships of many of the working people, nor be blind to the fact that in the immensity of present day competition, women are crowding men out of places the latter once filled. But there will always be plenty of work which women cannot undertake. They will never be soldiers or sailors, nor can they do the roughest and hardest work. They are not yet found working on the railroads in any capacity beyond that of waiting and scrub women. A note of depression is indeed found in the words of some of our prominent leaders, but instead there should be a note

Our schoolboys cannot do better for themselves than to make a point during February of reading Abraham Lincoln's sublime address at Gettysburg, and George Washington's immortal Farewell Address. American scholars should learn all they can of the sayings and the doings of our magnificent patriots and statesmen.

A Forgiving Spirit

In dealing with the little ones show a forgiving spirit, and aim to keep in the childish minds no smouldering angers. Teach the little ones that to forgive is noble, to revenge an injury most unworthy and mean.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—TO MY FRIENDS. Please use black ink when you write to Aunt Prudence. Not pale ink, and not a pencil.

—DOT. Mother knows best, dear. Unless she is willing, her little girl must not be escorted by schoolmates to and fro.

—CON AMORE. If the customs of the community do not make chaperonage necessary, pray take your own way. But I do not think that in any community, two young unmarried people should go for a twenty mile drive alone in the evening.

SNOWFLAKES

FLYING through the chilly air, whitest flake and feather, Building up a stately wall, little flakes together,
Never fairyland like this, of the wintry weather.

Fields and fences covered up, roofs and windows whitened;
All the wood-folk hide away, very cold and frightened;
When the sun comes out again won't the world be brightened?

THE ROYAL CORTEGE ON ITS LAST JOURNEY

WONDERFUL is the picture of the last voyage of the great Queen lying in state on the deck of the Alberta, while ten miles of warships, with flags draped and solemnly booming guns, form the setting of the pageant. Wonderful to those who heard it, those funeral marches of the mighty masters, Chopin and Beethoven. And she, who loved pomp and splendor only as an adjunct to her royalty, and who lay there asleep, heeding, like Elaine in her barge, her strange her silent share in the great procession. Would for the hour of Tennyson, that a fitting idyl might have celebrated the event. He wrote in fitting prophecy of the widowed Queen:

The love of all thy sons encompass thee,
The love of all thy daughters cherish thee,
The love of all thy people comfort thee,
Till God's love set thee at his side again.

At last, the long widowhood over, the Queen lies beside the man whom she loved, whose love was boundless and discretion proverbial, the Prince Consort, who all men honored, Albert the Good.

The homes of England have never been celebrated. And not the least of the great Queen's charms for her English subjects was the fact that she was a simple matron and mother, a good housekeeper, and a home-loving woman. It was said that she knew all the silver and china in the several palaces, so that on certain occasions, to do honor to certain visitors, she would personally order the plate and the porcelain service to be used on her dinner table. A Queen in the large things, she was also a Queen in the lesser ones.

Why Not?

A Settlement worker asked a young girl why she sat up so late every night. "Why don't you go to bed early, my dear?" she inquired. "You are worn out for lack of sleep."

This was the answer: "There are eleven of us in three rooms. The mattresses are all piled up during the day, and I am not strong enough to pull mine down. I must wait for my father and mother to do it. Then, if we all go to bed, there is so much noise that nobody can sleep."

Eleven souls and bodies in three tenement rooms! Only one bedstead, and mattresses on the floor for most of the family. No wonder the poor girl could get no beauty sleep.

The Queen's Gracious Tact

Frequent mention has been made recently of Victoria's wonderful tact. This is a talent not to be underrated, either in royal personages or in common people. Tact means touch. Now, we may touch our friends gently and caressingly, we may bring out their good points, and make them appear at their very best, or we may brusquely wound their sensibilities, hurt their self-love, and send them from our presence angry and estranged. The Queen's tact was proverbial, and was no doubt cultivated, for a modern sovereign must be affable and amiable to be popular. Yet she was always every inch a queen, abating no jot of her claims to dignity on every suitable occasion.

WASHINGTON'S 169TH BIRTHDAY

How the Nation will Celebrate the Patriotic Holiday

THIS year the people of the United States will celebrate the one hundred and sixty-ninth birthday of George Washington. We begin the twentieth century with an admiration for the Father of Our Country, as deep and as demonstrative as that which led the national mind at the beginning of the last century. Our affection for our hero is as ardent, our tribute to his memory on his birthday as spontaneous as it was in 1876, for instance, when the nation celebrated the centenary of its independence, and honored the part Washington played in securing that independence, with a gala function in Philadelphia, of several months' duration.

period are read. Similar exercises will doubtless be held in the public schools in other States.

Military organizations in every State will parade, with bands playing and "Old Glory" held aloft, followed by speech-making at many an armory in the evening, and at West Point and other military Schools, where the cadets or pupils are not allowed to go home for the holiday. Young and promising orators, inspired by the great career of Washington, are given an opportunity to show their talent, addressing their fellow-students on the subject of The First and Foremost American Citizen. Patriotic societies will hold annual meetings and dinners, paying a thousand tributes with tongue and pen to Hall of Fame. He was also brought into many of the successful books of the year as a leading character.

In the planning of the National Capitol by the authority of Congress, President Washington made seventeen reservations of ground of the Capitol, for public uses, the fourth of which was "for a National University." The tract of some twenty acres fronting on the Potomac River, and including a hill ten feet higher than Capitol Hill, and commanding a beautiful prospect, is still available. Washington gave to the United States, in his last will, his shares in the Potomac Company, for which there had been paid $25,000 cash, which amount, had it been properly cared for and compounded as he wished, would have reached to-day over four millions of dollars, but unfortunately from neglect, or bad financial management, this was lost.

Washington was among the first to champion the cause of higher education. Quite recently public attention has been directed to the following clause in his last will and testament:

It has always been a source of serious regret with me to see the youth of the United States sent to foreign countries for the purpose of education, often before their minds were formed, or they had imbibed any adequate ideas of the happiness of their own. My mind has not been able to contemplate any plan more likely to affect the measure than the establishment of a university in a central part of the United States, to which the youths of fortune and talent from all parts thereof may be sent for the completion of education, and where they may be enabled to free themselves in a proper degree from those local prejudices and habitual jealousies, which, when carried to excess, are never-failing sources of disquietude to the public mind, and pregnant of mischievous consequences to this country.

Then follows the bequest in question. Ever since the death of Washington there has been a desire among the most eminent Americans, including nine Presidents of the United States, that the first President's wishes should be carried out. The United States Senate has a permanent standing committee on the subject, which has three times reported favorably, and a National Committee of four hundred eminent citizens, under the chairmanship of Ex-Governor John W. Hoyt, and with Chief Justice Melville W. Fuller, of the United States Supreme Court, at the head of its Executive Council, has determined that the thing shall be accomplished.

HE CAN SAVE THEE

BY MRS. HUDSON MAXIM

(Taken from the Hymn Book "Hold the Fort.")

CRYSTAL waters of the Jordan
Bathed the sinless One,
And the voice of God proclaimed Him
His beloved son.

CHORUS.

He can save thee, He can save thee,
O, rebellious soul,
Still the waters of salvation,
Blessed waters roll.

Crystal waters of that fountain,
Banish sin and strife.
They are giving, still are giving,
Everlasting life.

Blessed waters of salvation,
Free as ambient air,
They can cleanse, exalt and save thee,
Banish thy despair.

By that crystal flood perfected,
Freely of every sin,
Then the pearls gates will open
Wide to let thee in.

When last scenes of earth are fading
On the dying eye,
Through the mist will break the vista
To the throne on high.

When the tears of love baptize thee,
For the long good-by,
He alone can save and tell thee
Thou shalt never die.

All part at the Stygian river,
All must pass it o'er.
He alone can reunite us
On the other shore.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON, FROM THE FAMOUS PORTRAIT BY STUART

This year, business will be suspended unusual, all over the country; all institutions will enjoy a holiday; countless flags will be displayed, and all the schools, public and private, will hold patriotic exercises before closing for a holiday lasting from Thursday afternoon, the 21st, till Monday the 25th. In the Manual of Patriotism, compiled by Charles R. Skinner, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, New York, for the use of the public schools, is a programme to be observed throughout the Empire State. It is a most inspiring programme, and is intended to infuse as much of the historic and patriotic as possible, and it is put in a form as to appeal to the imagination of the children. Washington and the Revolution are made the theme of talks, addresses, composition, recitation and song. After a short address by the teacher or principal, patriotic pieces are spoken, quotations are repeated in chorus by the school, and short sketches of Washington's life and career are read. Oliver Wendell Holmes' "Ode for Washington's Birthday" is sung by the school, after which compositions on the Revolutionary

Washington. Martha Washington Societies will give teas and parties, at which all the guests will appear in colonial costume. New York patriotic societies which will celebrate the day with special meetings are notably these: The Colonial Dames of America; Daughters of the American Revolution; Dames of the Revolution; Sons of the American Revolution; Mount Vernon Ladies' Association (for the care of the Washington estate at Mount Vernon, Va.); Order of Founders and Patriots of America; and the Society of Colonial Wars.

The year 1899 was a Washington Memorial Year, when all kinds of services were held as a solemn and sorrowful tribute to Washington, who died just a century before. This was followed by a year noted for its revival of interest in the places, persons and events of colonial times. The year 1900, indeed, will be remembered as a sort of Washington year. Washington Headquarters in the Eastern States received many unexpected contributions of Washington relics, colonial architecture became the fashion, and Washington's name is the first in the

A CLASS OF STUDENTS AT ELKHART INSTITUTE

AMONG THE QUAIN MENNONITES

Missionary and Educational Movements of an Interesting People

FEW religious sects have appeared so little in public print as the Mennonites, although they have been a unique, distinctive force in the world's spiritual life since the days of Luther, of whom Menno Simon, leader of the sect, was a contemporary. They have been in this country since 1683, and there are now some 60,000 of them here, and over 10,000 in Canada. The fact that they are branching out in foreign missionary work (a field in which they have been comparatively inoperative, and their recent activity in India relief—they sent many carloads of corn and much money last summer to India through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—has awakened interest in many people who seem to have heard little or nothing of them. Through the courtesy of Dr. Dewitt R. Good, of Dale Enterprise, Va., THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presents the following facts, compiled for this paper by Bishop L. J. Heatwole, of the Middle District Virginia Conference.

"Mennonites, previous to the year 1890, had never made public any statement of their work, at which time, reports as to their numbers, doctrines and tenets of faith, were rendered for use by the U. S. Census officials. The custom, from time immemorial, has prevailed among them to go about things in a quiet way, and they have never followed the custom of publishing an account of their work or the number of their communicants. With them the evangelical life is reduced to a principle that requires not only separation but also distinction from the world. With respect to this outward distinctive form—such as the "prayer head-covering" for women and the peculiar regulation dress for men, these people have maintained throughout all their generations the attitude of sober singularity before the world.

The first authentic account of any settlement of Mennonites in America is that of a body of some twenty-five members, who located at Germantown, Pa., October 6, 1683, coming thither from Holstein on the invitation of William Penn. The colony increased rapidly through subsequent immigration, and its members came under the notice of the neighbors as being very simple in their habits and mode of life; as adhering, like the Quakers themselves, to plain, modest apparel; as being slow to abandon the customs of their forefathers, and not readily adopting innovations of any kind. With the breaking out of the Revolutionary War, there were forty-two meeting-houses in Pennsylvania. Congregations are now located in at least twenty-five States, and in the Canadian Provinces.

All Mennonites recognize The Confession of Faith, consisting of eighteen articles, which was framed and adopted April 21, 1632, at the City of Dort, in Holland. In addition to the principles set forth in Baptism and the sacrament of bread and wine, this confession also enjoins the ordinance of Foot-Washing, enjoins marriage only between members of the same faith, prohibits membership in secret organizations, forbids the taking of oaths, and impresses upon Mennonites the doctrine of non-resistance.

The communion is observed twice a year. Every intending participant is carefully examined separately concerning his spiritual standing, before the day appointed for taking the sacrament. Immediately after the communion of bread and wine, comes the ceremony of Foot-Washing. The members of the sexes perform the office among themselves, each in turn washing and wiping the feet of his brother or her sister, and giving at the same time the hand of fellowship and the kiss of peace. Those who perform the duties of the ministry are chosen from the congregation to be served. Should more than one person be placed in nomination by the congregation, a day is appointed to choose by lot one from among the persons nominated. Deacons are chosen in the same manner, and are ordained to care for the poor and the sick, to adjust matters of difference among members, and in the absence of the minister to conduct the service with exhortation and prayer. Bishops are chosen from among the ministers, and are ordained to administer the right of baptism and the communion, to celebrate the rite of matrimony, and to have the pastoral charge of a district in which there are a number of places of worship, and a number of ministers and deacons, all under his direction."

The ministry, except for traveling evangelists, is unsalaried, preachers, deacons and bishops, supporting themselves, as a rule, at their ordinary occupations.

Their first college in this country—Elkhart Institute, Elkhart, Ind.—and the only one in existence among the class of which Bishop Heatwole writes, was incorporated in 1895. Among the growing institutions in the Mennonite Church, probably there is none which has such possibilities for usefulness. The school owns its own buildings and grounds, and has a well-equipped laboratory, a library, and modern facilities and methods of instruction. The Principal, Prof. N. E. Byers, is a graduate of Northwestern University. It is the earnest desire of the management to raise the endowment fund of $4,000 to $50,000 as soon as possible. Eleven States and Canada are represented in the enrollment. The religious influences surrounding the students are very good, and the sisters of the church who are attending the school wear the "prayer head-covering," as shown by the accompanying illustration, at the chapel exercises and at all devotional meetings. The group consists of a number of students, some of whom will graduate at the next commencement.

The recent Doukhobor emigration from Russia to America, will recall our Mennonite influx from that country, which attracted much attention, in 1871-6, when almost an entire remnant of a great company which had fled thither a hundred years before from Austria rather than submit to military impressment, came over to us, driven by the same goad, and settled in Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska and Dakota. It is their doctrine of non-resistance which has brought upon them their most persistent troubles. During the days that followed the Reformation they came under condemnation of Protestant and Roman Catholic rulers alike, for take up arms they would not at any command. No sect, it is said, according to numbers, has suffered so much from persecution or given so many martyrs for its faith. It was this fierce persecution and wholesale slaughter that quenched the missionary spirit which early history shows they exhibited in exceptional degree. Dr. Good has been prominently identified, both here and in Canada, with its modern revival.

From the Minneapolis Journal.

Have you ever stopped to think that the position of a saleswoman in a large dry goods store is a particularly trying one? Not to speak of the many unreasonable demands that are made upon her by the public, the physical requirements are considerable. Working long hours, being compelled to stand most of the time, and being expected to look pleasant regardless of suffering which she may be enduring, is it any wonder that the weak, nervous women find it impossible to follow this occupation? Everyone will be interested in the experience of Miss Nellie M. Tomlinson, of 317 Minnehaha avenue, Minneapolis, Minn., who is a clerk in one of the large dry goods stores of that city. In a recent interview Miss Tomlinson said:

"When I was eight years of age I had the scarlet fever and it left me with weak kidneys and a complication of diseases. I was so nervous that I could not sit quietly in school and would have to go home early every day. Finally I became so bad that I left school and did not go for an entire term. I had headache all the time and was too irritable to talk with any one. The least excitement seemed to make my heart flutter and a fainting spell would follow. At times I became so dizzy that I would have to sit down until the feeling passed away. My blood seemed to have turned to water and I had no color whatever in my face. I was a mere skeleton and had to lie down several times during the day. We called our family doctor and he left medicine, but no better health followed. I then had one of the best physicians in the city, but he did not help me."

"My parents read about Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People in one of our city papers and thought it would be wise for me to give them a trial. I began to get better when I had taken the first box and by the time I had used two and a half boxes I was well. Before I took the pills I could do no work of any kind, but now I can perform with ease my duties as clerk in a dry goods store. I think I was never before so well as I am to-day and it is all due to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People."

"I have recommended the pills to many of my friends and they are getting the same good results. I will be glad to have what I have said published if it will induce others who are suffering to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and be restored to health as I was."

A good old family doctor down in Eden-bur, Miss., says he is not afraid to tell the truth about coffee and its effect on him and the remarkable change produced by leaving off and taking Postum Food Coffee in its place.

I used coffee for many years, and says, "Oate years I have been so nervous that I dreled to perform an operation, and my eyeght had bothered me a considerable. I thil about two years ago I first heard of Postum Food Coffee, and gave it a trial. I am ot quick to bite at humbugs, but the chere in my physical condition brought abe by leaving off coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee was a complete surprise. I be-garo eat well, sleep well, and in just three mohs my eyesight was restored, my nerves strag, headaches disappeared, and my chronic catrh of thirteen years' standing was entirely omeome with little or no treatment except the range in coffee.

I am to-day stout, erect, and weigh 20 pords more than I did before giving up coffe. I have an extensive practice, and havhad very satisfactory results among my patits where I have induced them to leave off fee and take Postum in its place.

offee is ruining and destroying thousands of or young Americans, and it is a pleasure to low of a nutritious and palatable break-fas everage that rebuilds the nervous system ratlr than tears it down, as the old coffee do.

may interest you to know that we had mul the same experience as many others wh we first began to prepare Postum. We boild it in a desultory sort of way for a few minies and the product was not satisfactory. Tuog to the directions we discovered the faul and from that time we have followed tho directions, which are simple enough, with the most satisfactory results in point of flav and food value.

With my best wishes for your continued succs. Dr. A. G. Alston."

"Before They Call, I Will Answer"

PASSAGES FROM THE EXPERIENCES OF A CHAPLAIN IN THE PHILIPPINES

WHILE on one of the small islands of the Philippine group, it became necessary for me to go one day, with a guard of eight men, up the coast from our garrison, to learn something regarding the course of a certain river. We had gone across the country in order to reach the mouth of the river, and thus save quite a long tramp. I found, however, it would be necessary to follow the beach back to the post. We were among a people exceedingly war-like, and as the afternoon was quickly passing, it was very necessary that we should lose no time in getting back to the post before the gates of the city were closed and locked. When we had arrived at a point about a mile from our quarters we had to leave the sandy beach and climb over a lot of huge boulders. These continued for quite a distance. Then we found a stretch of mud and mire. Being soldiers who had learned to stop for nothing in our pursuit of Filipino insurgents, a little mud—though nearly to our knees—was not going to stop us. So we pressed on in the direction in which we knew our quarters to be. We soon found, however, that our progress was becoming slow. Then we became aware of the fact that we were really lost—nothing but a long stretch of mud and mire, getting deeper and stickier before us, a long stretch of mud and mire behind us—and evening and darkness coming on.

Some of the men were beginning to mur-mur a little, not knowing what the end might be. We were lost. What could I do? The answer came clearly: "Pray;" and I prayed. And immediately I knew I had been heard and that a way would be pointed out to me to lead my men. Suddenly a voice seemed to say: "Go right forward." I led in that direction, but the way seemed to grow worse. After ten minutes or so I again seemed to hear a voice, this time saying: "Now to the right." I looked and lo! a cocoa-nut grove a short distance away, telling me of the main-land—and more, the roof of a nipa hut! We were all right. In a very few minutes I had led my men on to the solid ground, and we were making our way through the cocoa-nuts and garden patches to the road.

We reached the city just as the gates were about to be closed. Surely God had heard and answered prayer.

One day, while busy with the duties of the post, word was brought to us that some of us were to be permitted to return, at least for a visit, to the home-land. The reader can imagine, perhaps, what such news meant to the men who had been long separated from loved ones, and who were even then nearly ten thousand miles away. Men who had seen hard service in post, trench, hospital, and on battlefield.

I found that my name was on the list. Karl Dent found his name there. Soon after he made the discovery he sought my quarters. He was a happy young man. We were happy to know that we were to go home at the same time. In the course of his rejoicing, Karl said to me:

"Chaplain, don't you want a permanent order for the trip?"

"Yes, Karl, I do," I replied.

"Then I apply for the position, chaplain," said he with a smile that had a wink in it.

"You're just the man I want, Karl," was my prompt answer. I was delighted at the boy's proposal, and began at once to make the arrangements necessary to secure his services.

After we left the small island on which we had been stationed, our transport touched at several ports to gather up men who, like us, had received word of their home-going. We stopped at Cebu Island. While there I found it necessary to go to a city down the coast from Cebu City. I of course took Karl with me.

We went in a small launch. The trip down was pleasant, but on the return we encountered a heavy sea and a very stiff gale. We rolled about considerably. By the time we were off Talisay Point we were having a wild time of it, and when within sight of the city of Cebu, at a point where the storm seemed to rage the very hardest, our engines broke down. We had no sails. The anchor was dropped, and fortunately held. What were we to do? The launch was rolling around so wildly it seemed certain our anchor chain would break or the anchor drag. The whistle was vigorously blown. The flag was run up reversed. The schooner we had been towing was cut loose. Some of our men were becoming frightened. Clothes were being hurriedly pulled off. It did look as though we were to be lost.

During all the excitement and distress, Karl stood at my side. He was calm and fearless. I was praying. I think Karl knew it. As I prayed a deep sense of relief came over me. I knew I had been heard, and that we would be rescued from our perilous condition. I turned to Karl. "It's all right, Karl," said I, "relief will come." The words had hardly been spoken when, as the bow of our launch dipped, there was brought to our view another launch from one of our cruisers, headed directly for us. Relief had come. Karl looked me full in the face. The very look told me that he knew it was an answer to prayer. Surely before I had called He had answered.

We were going through the Inland Sea in Japan. The weather had been threatening for a day or two. It looked dark ahead. The pilot whom we had taken on board was of the opinion that a typhoon was raging outside, and that we would run into a storm. Shortly before noon we did so, and were compelled to anchor. It was wild for a time. How long we would have to remain at anchor we could not tell. I knew how uneasy every delay made the men feel, and this, added to my anxiety to reach home as soon as possible, and knowing we had a long journey even if the weather were fair, led me to pray that we might soon be permitted to resume our journey. The answer that came to my prayer seemed to indicate the middle of the afternoon as the time for a clear-away of the storm.

Karl came to me. "How soon are we going, chaplain?" he asked, in a quiet way.

"About three o'clock, Karl," was my answer, and he saw that I felt convinced of it.

By three o'clock the storm had passed, all was clear before us and the orders were given to hoist anchor and go. As Karl and I stood at the rail watching the crew at work and enjoying the scenery that had been hidden before because of the storm, he turned to me and said:

"Chaplain, did you have something to do with bringing this bright weather?"

I knew that this was but another way of asking me if I had been praying.

"May be, Karl," I answered. He knew from the look I gave him that I had prayed.

"I thought so," he replied, and the moments of quiet that followed as we stood side by side at the rail, made me know that God was speaking to the boy.

$10 SECURES $400.00 LOT IN GREATER NEW YORK

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK CITY AND RETURN

$2,000,000 INSURES YOUR INVESTMENT—THE ASTORS' WAY OF MAKING MONEY MADE POSSIBLE TO SMALL INVESTORS—$10 SECURES $400 LOT WHICH IS GUARANTEED TO BE WORTH $500 BEFORE ONE YEAR FROM DATE OF PURCHASE—WE TAKE ALL RISK—READ EVERY WORD

THE largest, most reliable, most successful Real Estate Company in the world, Wood Harmon & Co., of New York City, are so positive that the values of their lots will increase 25 per cent. during the year 1901 that they will guarantee this increase to any investor—in case they cannot show it, they will agree to return all money paid them with 6 per cent. interest. We have one of the grandest opportunities of a lifetime for the small investor to make money—we give as good security as the strongest savings bank and instead of the 4 per cent. interest on deposits we can guarantee over 25 per cent. We thoroughly believe the lot which we now sell for $400 will in 10 years bring $4,000, in 20 years from $20,000 upwards. If you will carefully study this communication you will see our reasons.

The Astors and our wealthiest families have made their money from the increase in value of real estate. You can prove this point if you will take the pains to look it up. New York City property has increased in value more than that of any other place because of its enormous growth in population, and this growth of values and population is still going on. Since the consolidation of New York and Brooklyn, the increased facilities of rapid transit by bridge, trolley and elevated, the immense tide of increased population has turned Brooklynward. The attention of the public has been called to the great advantages of Brooklyn because it is only in that section that New York can grow—please note that point as it is the keynote to the situation. The influx of people into Brooklyn is so great as to severely tax Brooklyn Bridge—as a result new bridges are being built (one of which is nearly completed) and tunnels are being dug beneath the East River. Not only is Brooklyn Borough the only section in which New York can grow, but property in old New York City, the same distance from City Hall, would cost 20 to 40 times the money—note that point carefully, it is absolutely true.

Listen to Our Story. It is our business to study conditions existing or possible in the various cities of the United States, and we have aided in the development of 25 different cities. After 12 years' careful study in New York without purchasing, in 1898 we saw the trend of affairs, and before the consolidation of New York and Brooklyn we bought over 1,200 acres of the choicest land in Brooklyn, and which is now in the heart of that Borough. This land is only 3 1/2 miles from Brooklyn Bridge and is only 35 minutes from New York City Hall. We have over $2,000,000 invested in this land and are making it one of the most beautiful spots of New York. The growth of the city, together with our improvements, have increased the value of the property over 25 per cent. since a year ago, and we feel so sure that the increase will be at least the same, that we think there is no risk in guaranteeing it.

Listen to Our Proposition. Our property is improved in exact accordance with City Specifications. Streets 60, 80 and 100 feet wide, built to City grade, bordered on each side by 5 feet granolithic cementine sidewalks, flower beds and shrubbery, city water, gas, etc., all at our expense. For $10 down and $1.50 per week or $6.00 per month we sell you a regular New York City lot, subject to the following guarantees from us.

If at the expiration of the year 1901 this lot is not worth $500.00 we will refund all of the money you have paid us with 6 per cent. interest additional.

If you should die at any time before payments have been completed we will give to your heirs a deed to the lot without further cost.

If you should get out of employment or be sick you will not forfeit the land.

Titles are guaranteed to us by the Title Guaranty & Trust Co. of New York.

Note Our References. The Commercial Agencies, 20 National Banks and 30,000 customers all over the United States.

You will note three distinct points of advantage in this proposition. First—it is a Life Insurance for your family. Second—it enables you to pay in small sums as you would in your savings bank and cannot cramp you, and Third—it enables you to participate in the great growth of values in New York real estate which are due to natural conditions, and furthermore the three advantages are absolutely without risk.

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK. As further guarantee of good faith, we agree with all persons living East of Chicago to pay you in cash the cost of your railroad fare to New York and return if you visit our property and find one word of this advertisement a misrepresentation, or in case you buy to credit cost of the trip to you as a credit on your purchase. We would advise you if you are satisfied to credit cost of the trip to you in cash at your risk immediately, and we will select the very best lot for you. Or if you desire further particulars to write immediately for maps, details and information. It will cost you nothing to find out and thoroughly satisfy yourself—we solicit closest investigation. References by hundreds—our reputation is national.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Reason and Faith*

THIS is a book for an Age of Reason in the true sense. Its purpose is a very serious and practical one. It deals with difficulties that stumble faith and fling multitudes either into infidelity or Universalism. It is evidently the work of a man who has been tossed hard on deadly reefs and, having escaped, would help others in like case. It is a book for the man who has not found standing ground for a rational faith for himself or who has to deal with others in like straits. We do not know a book that would be more helpful to a young minister going out to his work in a world that was never fuller of perils to faith than at this moment.

It states in startling fashion at the outset the atheistic argument from the ravages of evil in the universe. So powerful is this chapter that we would advise no one to read it unless he is determined to read the whole book. Then follows the Theistic solution of the problem of evil, clear and convincing. Redemption from experienced evil establishes the soul in the highest conceivable estate of finite moral and spiritual grandeur. Then follows an exceedingly satisfactory outline of the rational grounds of the Christian faith. The chapter on Miracles leaves the reader with no doubt that any conviction of a wise and able God who cares for human race needing certainty of him, will authenticate his revelation by Miracle. The Miracle is reasonable. A masterly discussion of the relation of Repentance to Justification shows how real repentance breaks the guilty identity and makes impossible to ideal justice the infliction of the penalty of yesterday's sin upon the soul which by repentance has become no more of the realm of yesterday's moral estate. The contrast is strongly drawn between human and divine or ideal justice. The former must act by record because it has not insight, the latter by insight and not by record at all. No record of a repented past represents at all present actual character and desert, which are the only things that can come into judgment before the tribunal of the final Judge. "Repentance is at once quittance and acquittance."

Chapters follow on how we do actually come to believe in God and what must reasonably result from such belief, which are full of practical cogency. That the Bible is a book for all ages and stages of intellectual and moral development is admirably insisted on as proof of its more than human origin, in one chapter. In another the absolute unity of all bodies of evangelical Christians in the common faith of all the essentials of revelation gives corroboration to the soundness of the reason for faith in those essentials. Another chapter on the practical test of actual experiment by individuals and races is a triumphal march from first to last, while the final chapter, on the rights and function of reason establishing faith in command of the life, is a complete refutation of all charges that our Christian faith is either blind or unreasoning. We regret that the author did not insert a chapter on the reasonableness of belief in immortality, and that he did not sum up his book and clinch his argument by setting forth the array of Christian forces with which all the civilized races of men are entering the twentieth century. We rise from the perusal of this book with the conviction which the New York Evangelist expresses: "Every Christian will want to read it." We heartily agree with what we saw from the pen of a cultivated business man of Chicago: "I do not remember that I have ever read an equal number of sermons with so much interest and profit. They have given me keenest intellectual enjoyment. I shall re-read them. The themes are too broad and high to be compassed at a single reading. All the topics are discussed with convincing force, indeed so satisfactorily that scarce a half dozen sentences challenge my questioning. The style is sui generis, terse and withy. While the general level of thought is lofty and commanding, there are passages of almost unequalled grandeur and splendor, of such tremendous power and infinite sweep that the thought even of the trained Christian can scarcely follow. The themes are great, and it is enough to say that the thought and its dress are worthy of the themes. It is a grand book, and it will be strange if it does not make for itself a place in the thoughtful world—and keep it." THE CHRISTIAN HERALD agrees with that business man.

"Dr. Dale"

THE scene of this remarkable story, by Marion Harland, and Albert Payson Terhune, is laid in the oil lands of western Pennsylvania, a region until now strangely overlooked by American novelists. The public a-weary of novels which enfold problems as sugarplums encase pills, will enjoy a powerful, vivid, realistic story that deals with no abstruse enigma beyond the old, sad puzzle of love, labor, sin and suffering. The movement, quietly sustained in the earlier chapters, rises artistically to a thrilling climax as the tale goes on. It is not only strongly, but closely and most deftly woven throughout. Not an incident is without bearing upon the plot; there are no loose threads or floating ends.

Marion Harland has never done a better piece of work, and the strong hand and lively imagination of her collaborator infuse virile power into certain passages and chapters. As the first instance in the history of literature in which mother and son have written a book in partnership, Dr. Dale is worthy of note. It is more extraordinary that the result should be so masterly a production. Although for the first time mother and son appear as collaborators, this is not the first collaboration of Marion Harland and her son, Albert Payson Terhune, as readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will remember. When Marion Harland, in 1893, journeyed through the Holy Land (whence she wrote exclusively for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the fascinating series of articles afterward published in book form under the title of "The Home of the Bible"), her son was her fellow traveler, and helped largely in collecting and preparing the material for the articles. As the first co-authorship of this mother and son was thus formed, our readers will be especially interested in their second venture in the literary field.

Dr. Dale is published by Dodd, Mead & Co. It is absorbingly interesting and teaches a strong, unmistakable lesson in temperance and in practical religion. The book, although very recently published, has already exhausted its fourth edition. Here is a spirited bit of description drawn from life, of the opening of an oil-well, supposed to be exhausted:

Then, a second column shot through the floor of the derrick, half-way to the top, black as tar-mud, sand, stones, the fragments of dynamite cans, and through the pitchy column, a lurid, greenish stream that reached the apex of the tower, and before the spectators could exclaim, like seven thunders uttering their voices, a tremendous volume of gas, imprisoned from the foundation of the world, tore its way upward, enveloping derrick and tank, and hiding the light of day from the awe-stricken beholders below the hill.

Another minute, and it had cleared away, revealing a perpendicular shaft that glowed like burnished gold in the sun. Eighty feet high it mounted, curling, as it struck the crown-pulley at the top of the derrick, and shivering into amber spray, raining down upon the slopes on every side of the well. With the shout of a mountain torrent it rushed up, a solid pillar of rock-oil, to break and flow—Pactolus swollen into Amazon—into the prepared moat.

The commotion that ensued is not to be described in written language. The air was darkened by hats, caps, handkerchiefs, canes and shawls tossed high above the heads of

"SWEET" EATERS.

Way to Correct Children's Taste.

Sometimes children become willful and refuse nourishing food, demanding sweets, candy, ice cream, etc., much to their detriment. It is a great help in such cases to a food that is naturally sweet and attractive. A case in Phila. will illustrate.

The daughter of Mrs. M. E. Seales, 1330 Mifflin St., was a delicate child in infancy and had been indulged in many things. She gradually got thinner and fretful daily, refusing food other than sweets, etc., finally contracting whooping cough which undermined her health to such an extent that her attending physicians agreed that cough had developed into bronchial catarrh and that only a short time would ensue before consumption would relieve her sufferings.

In despair, the child's aunt was sent and knowing the wonderful nutritive value of Grape-Nuts food, she prepared some and duced the little one to eat it. At the taste she said: "Oh auntie, this is so nice I want some more." From that time she acquired an appetite and began to improve. She was fed on Grape-Nuts steadily and now she is a perfectly healthy, strong child, attends the Girls' Grammar School, and a bright and apt pupil.

men and women in the intoxication of delight. The bellow from human throats arose above the shout of the geyser. Men cast themselves upon one another's necks, weeping and laughing, the piercing hurrahs of women and boys' voices cut the body of sound like knives; terrified babies screamed; a cordon of police waded itself between the base of the hill and the excited masses that tried to get nearer the moat. Beyond all, the graded eminence arose like a gilded dome, so continuous and glorious was the rush of oil into the vast trench prepared to receive it.

The reopening of "The Ruth" turned a new and garish page in the history of the oil industry. As the winds from all quarters of the heavens rushed into the vacuum made by flame, the wild-fire of excitement of that memorable day brought a flight of adventurers from every point of the compass into the valley where oil flowed as a river. Town lots were sold at gilt-edged prices; architects and contractors labored, day and night, upon specifications; new gin-mills flew the devil's flag at dozen corners; blacklegs and chemical bandits drove their accursed trades with the glib and the vicious, whose left hands speedily squandered the money made by the right. The money-making fever raged in the veins of the tramp population until all sense of honesty and decency went to the dogs, and finally the victims of the craze followed it.

John Bell, the "live" young minister, one of the heroes of the book, finds his work increased a hundredfold by the "boom."

The plait between his level brows was deeper and longer there than Myrtle or Rh liked to see. He was away from home a great deal nowadays, and frequently out late at night. Sometimes Sody McAlpin or Carl Nolting accompanied him. Sometimes, but more rarely, Dale or Ralph Folger shared his beat of vigil. Generally, he walked alone, fearfully, although known by his height and fire to every rough who had been two days in town. He had been to enter the Oilman's Rest at one o'clock in the morning and to come out, half carrying, leading a man who could not walk. He beat up recruits for the baseball nine; for the newly organized Choral Union; for the Bachelors' Club; for Sunday School and the Men's Bible Class taught himself. He visited drunken husbands, talked with wives driven desperate by the cruelty of husbands; he and his coworkers gathered homeless children and vagrant women from the streets, and gave them shelter and food and a chance to get back to safety and friends.

Sody McAlpin told Ruth Folger, in one of the conferences over the "Inasmuch Library," to which she summoned him more often than of yore, that "one line of my hymn was aye singing itself in his head whenever he spied the Dominie making his rounds:

"Seeking to save! seeking to save!"

"Ruth"

THIS book is a delightful study of one of the most exquisite bits of literature in the world. Its author has gotten into the very atmosphere of this beautiful idyl of the olden time. He sees Bethlehem and the mountains and ancient cities of Moab; sees Elimelech and Naomi, Mahlon and Chilion, Coah and Ruth; Boaz, the bluff and hearty, the true and godly; the workmen at the fields in the sunlight of their ties, as they basked in it and wrought as suffered and rejoiced. And he gives his readers the vision. No more sympathetic and chivalric interpreter and champion of the sweet "Rose of Moab" has ever appeared, or of the chastened but splendid nobleness of Naomi, or of the admirable Boaz. With the strokes of a master he sets out the perilous venture of departure from the sacred land and the forbidden heathen marriages, the pathos of the death-stricken family beside their graves in Moab, the heart-rending picture of Naomi's departure and dismissal of her daughters-in-law; the weeping figure of Coah as she passes alone out of sight at the out of history to her mother and her girls, and that marvelous scene of Ruth's invincible devotion: "Entreat me not to leave thee!" The lofty and bitter pathos of Naomi's reply to the questions of the women of Bethlehem; the pastoral pictures of the gleaner and the owner, and the men and the mid-day meal; the threshing-floor and the night of the winnowing; the marriage, the motherhood, Naomi with the babe in her arms receiving the congratulations of the women—it is a perfect story, in its swift, pure and lofty action.

Its treatment in this book is nigh the ideal for the manner in which these wonderful stories and characters of the Old Testament should be handled. Seductive excursions all along lead off in delicious by-paths, as when he discusses second marriages, or the jibes at mothers-in-law, or draws lessons of the grace of adversity and the glory of sorrow; or from the delightful relations between Boaz and his men, defines the everlasting equities of labor and capital; or draws the contrast between impulse and steadfastness from Orpah's impulsive kiss and Ruth's invincible adhesion; or from the whole story evolves a mighty sermon on the "Redeeming Power of Human Affection." This Ruth of Dr. Fiske is an altogether admirable and fascinating masterpiece in its line. It will quicken interest in and enthusiasm for not only this particular piece of Old Testament Oriental literature, but for many another gem which glows serene in either Testament.

BOOKS RECEIVED

A Merry Little Visit With Auntie. By Mary D. Brine, author of Sunny Hours. Illustrated. This is a charming story for little girls; and little boys might like it very well, too. Pp. 94. American Tract Society, New York.

Environment. By James G. K. McClure, President of Lake Forest University, author of Possibilities, The Great Appeal, etc. This is a most practical and helpful essay upon a subject of vital interest to every one. Pp. 39; price 25c. Publishers, Fleming H. Revell Co., New York City.

For Hearts That Hope. By James G. K. McClure, author of Environment, etc. The author says that in this message he "attempts such a statement of the nature of Heaven as is clearly warranted by the teachings of the Bible." Pp. 51. Price, 25 cents. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York.

Bulwarks of the Faith. By James M. Gray, D.D. A brief and popular treatise on the evidences of Christianity, or the authenticity, truth and inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, arranged with questions for use in Bible Institutes and Training Schools. Pp. 163. Price, 5c. Christian Alliance Publishing Company, New York.

Chicago, Satan's Sanctum. By L. O. Curon. A book like this would be heart-breaking to the Christian reader if it were not for the reflection that there is a side, a bright side, to the great city's life which has not been given by the author. If knowledge of evil leads to its correction, then this volume should be read. Pp. 232; published by C. D. Phillips & Co., Chicago, Ill.

Old Lanterns for Present Paths. By Francis E. Clark, D.D., President United Society Christian Endeavor. The "messages for young lives" contained in this booklet, must be of great help to modest, timid, shrinking youth, which yearns to become bold, uncompromising and fearless in the Master's service. Pp. 45. Published by United Society Christian Endeavor, Boston and Chicago.

Unto Him. By John H. Vincent. Bishop Vincent's name as author is strong enough recommendation of any book. The present dainty volume, belonging to Revell's "Ideal Series" of booklets, is prefaced with a brief description of the nature and uses of Christ's new building, the "Aula Christi," or "Hall of Christ," which is to be "a memorial unto Him." Pp. 31. Price, 25 cents. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York.

Class and Desk. A manual for Sunday School teachers. By Rev. James Comper Gray and Charles Stokes Carey. Although this volume is intended primarily for the use of Sunday School teachers, it may be of service to heads of families who will find it a pleasant exercise to use the lessons among their children. Its suggestions may be helpful, also, as material for addresses and sermons. Pp. 293. Price, 50 cents. American Tract Society, New York.

The Silent Prince. A story of the Netherlands. By Hattie Arnold Clark. William of Orange; the Huguenot preacher Francis Junius, otherwise Prince of Aremburg; Margaret of Parma, the cruel and bigoted regent, are among the historic characters who figure in this thrilling story of times when the reformed religion, driven from Spain, was struggling for existence in the Netherlands. Pp. 279. Illustrated. American Tract Society, New York.

Would Christ Belong to a Labor Union, or Henry Fielding's Dream. By Cortlandt Myers, D.D., author of Midnight in a Great City, etc. The story of this book is a story, which the author says is not all fiction—opens with a brave, stirring, but conservative sermon, of which the question forming the title of the book forms the theme. If there were nothing else of interest in the book, that sermon would make it worth a reading. Pp. 216. Publishers, Street & Smith, New York.

Moosiva and Others of the Boundaries. By W. A. Fraser. Illustrated by Arthur Heming. These stories of the "furred folk" of our Northern forests—the moose, bear, fox, wolf, otter, hare, beaver and all their four-footed company—will be the delight of many a boy and girl. What Rudyard Kipling and his illustrator did in Jungle Tales to bring the inhabitants of Eastern forests in entertaining guise before readers, young and old, Mr. Fraser and Mr. Heming have done in this most fascinating volume. Pp. 261. Price, 5c. Publishers, Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

HOW HE FOUND CHRIST

Professor Amos R. Wells Tells the Story of his Spiritual Experience

THE pen is not only mightier than the sword, it is mightier than eloquence, and more enduring than the tones of the human voice. Job knew long ago that the man who was to make his mark in the world must write things down. When he longed for an iron pen, and a chance to scratch his testimony on the rocks for a manuscript, it is because he felt that what he said could not endure in comparison with the written word.

In that remarkable group of vigorous young spirits that have been the guiding brains and hearts of the world-wide Christian Endeavor movement, none perhaps have written themselves down more permanently in the life of the time, and have done more to mold and fashion the religious spirit of that mighty movement than Professor Amos R. Wells, who sits with his hand on the managing helm of the journal that speaks not only officially, but inspirationally to the vast hosts of Christian Endeavor. Amos Wells was brought up under influences which turned him early into theoretical Christianity. Looking back over it, he is now of the opinion that for a number of years before he made a public confession of Christ, and united with the church, he was, nevertheless, a Christian, though in a formal and unenthusiastic sort of way. For some years he took part in the prayer-meeting of the Presbyterian Church where he attended, and taught in its Sunday School, also conducting religious exercises in the college where he was a Professor, but had not yet united with the church.

Professor Wells' college associations had had the effect of inspiring in him a strong inclination toward the Unitarian belief, and made it necessary for him to fight every inch of his way back to the orthodox position. He was especially helped, first, by Mark Hopkins' Evidences of Christianity, a book that has fought the battle for more than one scholarly young man, who has found himself befogged by the sophistries of purely intellectual reasoners. Later, young Wells got great help from Professor Fisher's Short Manual of Christian Evidences. None of these things, however, brought him into the church, and he did not unite with the church until he was forced to do so by the logic of circumstances, through his work in the Christian Endeavor Society. He joined the Endeavor Society in the Presbyterian Church which he was attending, and soon after was invited to speak at the State Christian Endeavor Convention.

In that convention a great deal was said about church membership. It was very strongly emphasized that a man who loved Christ, and relied upon him for salvation, was under obligations to Christ to make his friendship open and public, so that Christ's kingdom might have the benefit of it. It was also urged that every follower of Christ owed it to other Christians who were members of the church, and were carrying Christ's colors to the front, daring all opposition, to come out openly on the Lord's side, and stand bravely with the other soldiers of Jesus. It was still further insisted upon, that every Christian man owed the unconverted man, who knew not Christ, the influence and example of a public testimony for Jesus.

All this had a very strong influence on Professor Wells, and he clearly saw the inconsistencies of his position. When the next year's State Convention came around he was asked to speak again, and made up his mind that he could not go to another Christian Endeavor Convention as a non-church member. It was an embarrassing thing to join the church now, after going on so long, taking part in the meetings, and acting in the same way as he would have done if he had been a member of the church. But he saw that when you have once put yourself in a wrong position there is only one way to cut yourself out, that is to do the right thing that stands before you. And so that Presbyterian Church, which had become accustomed to Professor Wells as one of its most active Christian Endeavor workers, was greatly astonished when he joined the church. Professor Wells says: "I have never failed since then to confess my error in not taking this step earlier, and to urge upon young Christians the impossibility of a real Christian life apart from church membership."

God's promise is that if we are planted in the gardens of the Lord we shall flourish there. We ought to put ourselves in such a relation to God, to other Christians, and to the unconverted world, that we shall have the very best possible opportunity, not only to grow in grace ourselves, but to make our lives influential with others, to attract them to the Christian Church.

REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Florida Needs Evangelists

Mr. W. B. L., of Orlando, Fla., writes:

Dear Editor—I have just finished reading in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD "A Town Taken for Christ." The thought came to me immediately, "Why cannot our spiritually dead town be revived by similar means?" The answer came quick, "It requires money to employ the evangelist and his singing helper, and we cannot raise the money." Since the destructive freeze of 1894, we have been barely able to live, and are just now beginning to see a brighter future in financial matters, and there is evidence of greater spiritual interest in our churches. Then the question suggested itself, "Will not our more fortunate brothers of the North be glad to lend to the Lord, by sending help to us and other towns in Florida in the shape of a tried evangelist and a singing helper, who would be benefited in health by a few months in Florida, and with God's blessing turn many from death to life, who, perhaps, are just waiting for such an occasion as such a visit would bring?" Our towns are now flush with Northern visitors, who are resting and recruiting for a few weeks, and have, and will take, more time to listen to the Heavenly Message perhaps than they are likely to do when they return to their places of business at home.

STRENGTH FOR TO-DAY

LORD, I have often asked Strength for a year;
I wanted all the mists
To disappear,
That I might see my way
And walk therein;
And gird myself with strength
The fight to win,
The summer and the winter
Spread before,
Nor be afraid to climb
The mountains o'er.

But now I am
A little child again,
Fearing the darkness,
And afraid of pain.
A year is long;
I am content with days;
I want the Lord to govern
All my ways.
What he shall give me
Is enough for me;
I know that as my day
My strength shall be.

Proposed Y. M. C. A. "Health Farm"

EX-GOVERNOR ALVA ADAMS, of Colorado, sends the following with reference to the philanthropic project of the Denver Y. M. C. A.:

PUEBLO, COLO., Feb. 1, 1901.
Editor The Christian Herald:
MY DEAR SIR:—I note with pleasure the age you give in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Jan. 23, 1901, to "Colorado's Ministry to the Sick." The suggestion of Mr. Danner, the Colorado Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., at a Health Farm be established in Colorado, is an inspiration. It means health and employment to the many who have been crushed by the great American scourge, consumption. Colorado's climate is an absolute anacea for incipient lung disease, and promises many years of usefulness to those upon whom disease has so encroached as to leave it a few months of life if they remain in the east. When a young man finds himself ricken, he turns toward the high, dry alps of the mid-continent, there only is hope for him. He will take desperate chances—azard comfort and livelihood—to reach this end of health. We cannot blame him—"for that will a man not give for his health." The result is that our streets are filled with delicate young men and women seeking employment any rate of wages that will pay their minimum expenses. It takes independence, and read and butter and shelter as well as climate to restore health. Colorado is and will continue to be the Mecca of these unfortunate invalids, but unless they can have a home of reasonable comfort, some method by which they can sustain themselves, their cases will be as hopeless here as in their Eastern homes. Mr. Danner's scheme will provide this work, this independence, this needed home. I know of no philanthropy that will aid so many worthy people. It will ransom thousands of broken, hopeless lives and give them the benefit of the sunshine, pure air and ozone which the Almighty pours over the mountains and plains of Colorado for the healing of the nations. How I envy the millionaire, who, without depriving himself, can take advantage of this opportunity of doing good. It is the best investment I know.

ALVA ADAMS.

Found Christ in the Bowery Mission

The converts of the Bowery Mission are found in almost all lands. A letter from London, just received, gives this interesting experience, which will be read with pleasure by all who are engaged in spiritual work:

LONDON, ENGLAND, Jan. 21, 1901.
Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I wish to thank you (I should have done so long ago) for the Bowery Mission. I know it has been kept open through your kindness. It was through the support of the Mission and its workers, I today am found on the Solid Rock—chiefly in answer to your superintendent's prayer. I know few return to thank the Saviour for his wondrous power, and consequently drift back into the world through their own ingratitude. Being afraid to confess his power unto their fellow-men, they go unconfessed and die in their own self-righteousness.

I am a member of St. Paul's, Hawley Road, and this is my fourth year in the office of the London & N. W. Railway as clerk, and I am sure my home to-day is a home. Before I knew the Mission, I was a wanderer in a foreign land, a drunkard, undeserving the name of man. You may use this letter, either to be read in the Mission, or for the benefit of the cause in any way, and I pray God may bless the message unto some poor hungering soul. The brother of our Master tells us: "He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death and shall hide a multitude of sins." God bless you unto the extension of His Kingdom. C. H. E.

UNFORGOTTEN

THE name has dropped from the household life,
The ribbons and jewels are put away,
We are out again in the world's hot strife,
And have left behind us her sweet bright day.
Her picture is shut in the album's clasp,
That beautiful picture that looks so young,
And she has slipped from our loving grasp,
Like a flower that's blossomed, a song that's sung.

Green is the grass on the trodden walk,
Once beaten hard by our constant feet;
No more of that lowly grave we talk,
Nor dwell on that time so strangely fleet
When she was here, and alive and warm,
Ere yet her wonderful grace was hid,
Poor lily, crushed in the winter storm,
And shut in the dark by the coffin-lid.

But you are wrong if you think that we Ever forget our darling's day,
If you fancy that all eternity
Could snatch the child from our love away.
There are times when we feel her very near,
When we dream that she sits in her vacant chair;
There are Springs and Falls in each fitting year,
When she seems the wealth of the world to share.

It may be a waft from the lilac bush
Blooming and blushing beside the door,
It may be a sudden, tender hush
When the robins trill in the eaves once more.

Or just the floating, loosened leaf,
When the maple flames in gold and red;
Ah! hers was beauty so bright, so brief,
And we know her living, though she is dead.

In the wooing and plighting of lass and lad,
In the innocent round of the household mirth,
In the happy hours serene and glad
The days of hoping, the day of birth,

Again, our child of the long ago
Is with us, just as she used to be,
And she's not forgotten in weal or woe,
The one we love, whom we do not see.

Some stir must always be in heaven,
And some press closest to the gate,
When home return the sin-forgiven,
For whom so long the ransomed wait.
And one day in that better land
The desolate parting hours past,
Our darling one will take my hand,
And lead me to our Lord at last.

THE BETRAYAL OF JESUS

How Sinful Ambition Cherished in the Heart Made Judas a Traitor

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

JUDAS was one of the chosen twelve; chosen to be with Jesus; in body, in spirit, in purpose, of life, with him (Mark 3: 14). He, with the remainder of the twelve, was also ordained "to preach," and to have power to heal sicknesses and to cast out devils. How came it, then, that a man gifted with power to cast out devils should become the slave of the devil? He believed in Jesus, but at the same time he sought his own ends, and when self-interest dominates a man, there Satan has an open door. The small earthly possessions of Jesus and his disciples were put into a common bag, and this Judas got possession of, and yielded to his passion for gain by pilfering from it. "He was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein (John 12: 6). This sin must have commenced in the early days of his discipleship. More than a year before his crucifixion, Jesus had said to his disciples: "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" (John 6: 70). He spake of Judas.

It is a dangerous thing to trifle with sin; and sin has a ready entrance wherever we yield to self—self-love, self-consideration, self-interest, or self-glory. We are not our own, we "are bought with a price" (1 Cor. 4: 19); and our only "reasonable service" is to yield our bodies, with all their members, and with our will, which is the citadel of our being, "a living sacrifice" to him who has bought us (Rom. 12: 1). Then the Holy Spirit takes possession, and Christ dwells in our hearts by faith (Eph. 3: 17). He can only enter and dwell within us when self is denied at every point. No limited monarchy for the King of kings. And where he is not in possession, there is room for Satan to enter, and to make use of us as he did of Judas to deny our Lord. There is no neutral ground for God's children; we are every day and hour either confessing or denying our Lord. All our words and actions reflect either honor or dishonor upon our Lord. The spirit in which we live and speak is either the spirit of Christ, or our own spirit, which is more or less contaminated by the arch-enemy.

It seems almost inconceivable that one who had been a chosen disciple, associated with Jesus for over three years,—one who had heard his teachings, watched his holy, disinterested life, and seen his miracles—could have had the heart to betray him. Luke, seeing as he does the human side of Jesus, notes what the other evangelists had failed to record: "But Jesus said unto him, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss!" He spoke as man to man, but this appeal met with no answer from him who had yielded his will and his members to Satan.

Matthew, seeing the kingly side of Jesus, records that He addressed this treacherous disciple as "Friend." "Friend," he said, "do that for which thou art come" (Matt. 26: 50, R.V.). Then they came and laid hands on Jesus; they, the hired mercenaries; but Jesus counted it the work of Judas, who betrayed Him; he was the responsible doer, they were the irresponsible instruments. It was at this moment that the disciples, says St. Luke, "seeing what would follow, said, Lord, shall we smite with the sword?" Poor human nature, which would take upon itself to defend Jesus! The impetuous Peter (John 18: 10, 11), without waiting for his master's answer, "having a sword, drew it, and smote a servant of the high priest, and struck off his right ear" (Luke 22: 49, 50).

Jesus needed none to defend him against what the Scripture led him to expect. His betrayal had been foretold. "He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me" (John 13: 18; Ps. 41: 9). He knew, and had five times told the disciples, of his coming sufferings. He knew all things that were coming upon Him (John 18: 4, R.V.). He had learned in Isaiah 50: 6, that his back should be smitten, the hair plucked off his cheeks, his face spit upon. He knew his face should be marred more than any man, and his form than the sons of men (Isa. 52: 13, 14); he knew, and had entered deeply into, all that Isaiah 53 would be to him. Psalms 22, 38, 69 had taught him much of the detail of what he was to go through, and he never drew back from the position he took up when he came into the world—"Lo I am come (in the roll of the book it is written of Me) to do Thy will, O God" (Heb. 10: 5-7).

One word more must be spoken: it was Christ's last word to the multitude: "In that hour said Jesus to the multitude, are ye come out as against a robber, with swords and staves to seize me? I sat daily in the temple teaching, and ye took me not. But all this is come to pass that the Scriptures of the prophets must be fulfilled." Then, when the last glimmer of hope in the hearts of the disciples that Jesus would even now restore the kingdom to Israel, died out, they, too, forsook him and fled. In awful but accepted loneliness, he must go forward to the cross, his mission apparently an absolute failure. And he went—a conqueror in all his submission, a king in all his humiliation, the Author of Life, more than ever before, in his death. Betrayed by man, he would not betray the trust his father had committed to him, to redeem man, and he would not, and did not, betray man, whose cause he had so fully made his own. Oh, shall we not fall at his pierced feet and adore him?

Saving a Great City's Waifs

To those of our readers who have been actively interested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S work in past years among the poor children of the New York tenements, the following extract from a recent address by Hon. Randolph Guggenheimer, President of the New York City Council, will be found full of significant meaning:

"A large majority of the wealthy people of this city, although in their home relations they are full of love, sympathy and friendship, live in criminal ignorance of the hideous truth that, in this city at the present moment, there are above three thousand homeless boys. These children represent the social problem of the future. Some are vagrants, and will, unless a wise system of remedial legislature be adopted for their regeneration, continue to be vagrants. The larger number of these three thousand homeless boys are homeless because they have lost their natural protectors. They cannot be touched by charitable organizations and by the churches. They are simply the fotsam and jetsam of the municipal sea. They earn a precarious living by 'panhandling' and by stealing. Many of them are truants, not only from school but from their homes. A great number live by selling newspapers; and many of them, even in that calling, lay a sound foundation for future prosperity in business and the professions. The newspaper boy at ten years of age has acquired more keenness of judgment and decision of character than the average college student at twenty-three. Though a child, he is a man of the world.

"I believe that society should help all homeless boys. I am glad that there are cheap lodging-houses for men, and I think it is our duty to establish, as we have done, some kind of lodging-houses for homeless boys.

"I have spoken first of homeless boys, simply because their necessities are obvious and insistent. They force themselves upon the attention of all thinking men and women. But of course I recognize the fact that their lot is not as pathetic as that of little girls who have lost their natural protectors, or, indeed, as that of the daughters of the tenement, who are forced by their parents' narrowness of means to earn their own livelihood. For the former, during their immature years, there is only one refuge, and that is to be found under the auspices of a loveless and cheerless institution. Sooner or later, however, they are obliged to enter the arena in which is enacted through all the generations the pitiless struggle for existence."

RELIGIOUS BARRENNESS*

Solemn Lessons Conveyed by the Parable of the Barren Fig Tree

WHAT is the object of conversion? Is it simply the salvation of one particular soul from punishment after death? That would be a very crude idea of it. It means that, but it means much more. In the parable of the vine (John 15: 1) and in that of the barren fig tree there are explicit intimations that other results are expected from conversion. There are trees that are merely ornamental, but neither the vine nor the fig tree belong to that class. They must bear fruit, otherwise they are failures. In the case of the tree in the parable, both the Lord of the vineyard and the dresser recognized the fact. The tree up to that time had been a failure; it had not fulfilled the purpose for which it was planted, which was to bear figs. Even the dresser, in spite of his desire to spare the tree, agreed that after a year's reprieve it did not produce fruit, it should be cut down. It was a solemn lesson, coming, as it did, from Christ's lips. With all his tenderness and love, he represents the dresser as saying: "Not, then, thou shalt cut it down." How long has he said this about some of his blessed followers? How many of them have failed to produce the fruits of the Spirit of which Paul gives a catalogue in Galatians 5: 22, 23! How many whose lives show no evidence of the Spirit's indwelling! Eager in the pursuits of the world, getting pleasure in the world's amusements, quick to resent injuries, domineering and arrogant to their employees, indifferent to the moral and spiritual welfare of their associates—no wonder that the Lord of the vineyard is disappointed. There is another reason, too, for destruction—the barren tree cumbereth the ground. It occupies the place which, if it was not there, might be filled by a tree that would bear fruit. If the position of wealth and influence were occupied by a man who was in earnest and was sincere, how much gain might come to Christ's kingdom! Opportunities for usefulness are unimproved and are wasted; what if, losing patience with supineness, we should remove the offender and put in his place a man who would be alert in his service? It might be better not only for Christ's kingdom, but for family and servants and society. But Christ pleads for more time and opportunity, and the barren soul's life is prolonged. But not indefinitely. Its continued existence depends on fruit-bearing. The time will come when the prospect of the fruits of the Spirit ever coming from that stem is so dark that even Christ will plead no longer. Having done everything for the man that can be done, and there are still no fruits in his life, the opportunity for service is taken away, or the man gives place to his successor. What other course can be pursued? There may be many who have entered on the last year of grace. If they only knew it, there might be change in the character. But they are not notified, and there is no need. Their business being to bear fruit in their souls and in the field of the world, they cannot expect warning. Their normal condition is fruit-bearing, and if that condition has been checked by ambition, covarice, or wicked pleasures, the life is broken, and the man knows it and is aware of the consequences.

What is the process which is indicated by the dresser's remedy for barrenness? He is digging about the roots. Sorrows and bereavements and losses and disappointments disturb the environment of the unfruitful soul. The world is no longer the place it was to him. His circumstances change. But these of themselves cannot change his nature. All that they can do is to remove obstacles, to open a way for the fertilizer to reach him, and very often that is effectual. He perceives the defects in his former conduct, and he gains fresh spiritual life and energy from the promises and incitements to effort which have entered his soul through the painful discipline. He says, "It was good for me that I was afflicted." He learns his need of God's comfort and finds that the only way to obtain it is to arouse himself from his lethargy. So the dresser's methods succeed and he begins to bear fruit. But if instead, he rebels; if he repines under his affliction, then there is no hope. All has been done that can be done, and he must cumber the ground no longer. In these days, we are dwelling more than formerly on the love and fatherhood of God, but we must not lose sight of the other elements in his character. It is a serious thing to take upon us the name of Christ, for it involves duties that it is dangerous to ignore. God expects more from us, and he will not be satisfied unless there are results. The Spirit is ready to help, God has placed almighty power at our disposal and there is no excuse for barrenness. The opportunity for service is a privilege, the value of which will not be fully realized until we see those who have turned many to righteousness shining as the stars for ever and ever.

A Voice from Behind the Bars

THERE is something peculiarly touching about a letter from a prisoner, even though one realizes that the situation which arouses pity is the result of his own act. A prisoner's correspondence is hedged about with difficulties; a whole paragraph of conditions is given in the letterhead of the sheet upon which any communication from him appears, and with his name he signs a number. Well may one urge upon the young and the tempted: "Prize your liberty and do naught to bring yourself within prison walls." Sometimes, however, in imprisonment, one has found true freedom, through being brought to a realization of his shortcomings and to acceptance of his better self as found in the service of Christ Jesus. The following letter is an illustration of how the message that was not sought outside a prison was heard within:

I saw in a back number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD something about its distribution among prisoners. My cell-mate and I are studying the Bible and find that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a great help to us, and we appreciate it very much when we are fortunate enough to obtain it. We are very much interested in the sermon and Sunday School lesson; many of us would not have been here if we had taken up this interest early in life. If there is any fund for sending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to prisoners, we would be glad if you would send it to us, for we are not able to subscribe for it. If you will send the paper, we will pass it to others who are studying the Bible, that all may be benefited by it.

The letter is signed H. G. P., No. 374, Wyoming State Prison, Laramie, Wyo.

The English edition contains no information later than 1890. It contains no biographies of living individuals, no biographies of such men as Bismarck, Gladstone, Grant, Blaine, they all being alive when the Britannica was published.

All these and thousands of articles on Science, Art, Literature, etc., of special interest to Americans, are supplied by our American Supplement, the work of 500 experts.

It brings the entire work down to date, having articles on the Boers, South African Republic, Spanish-American War, none of which are found in the English Edition.

OUR NEW APPENDIX VOLUME, with our exhaustive American Supplement, takes every important title in the work and gives all that is recent concerning it, bringing information down to date. It contains also 52 New Maps, including the new Government map of Klondike, Hawaii, Cuba. Thus, with our supplemental volumes, the Britannica becomes the LATEST as well as the GREATEST.

FREIGHT PREPAID. We will send this piano or your choice of 23 other Wing Pianos on trial to any part of the United States, all freight paid by us. We will allow ample time for a thorough examination and trial in the home, and if the piano is not entirely satisfactory in every respect we will take it back at our own expense. There is no risk or expense to the person ordering the piano. No money is sent to us in advance, we pay all freights.

THE INSTRUMENTAL ATTACHMENT

imitates perfectly the tones of the Mandolin, Guitar, Harp, Zither and Banjo. Music written for these instruments, with and without piano accompaniment, can be played just as perfectly by a single player on the piano as though rendered by a parlor orchestra. The original instrumental attachment has been patented by us and it cannot be had in any other piano, although there are several imitations of it.

Description of Style 29.

7-8 Octaves.
Double lever, grand repeating action.
Grand scale, overstrung bass: three strings to each note in middle and treble registers.
The scale is the same as in grand pianos, with the largest size of sound board and strings of greatest length, thus giving the greatest volume of power and tone.
CASE—Double veneered inside and outside.
Choice of superior Circassian walnut, rich figured mahogany, genuine quartered oak and ebonyized.
KEYS—Of best ivory and ebony.
IMPROVEMENTS—Wing Pianos have the following improvements, viz.: "Built up" wrest plank construction. "Dovetail" top and bottom frame case construction. Full metal plate, with metal depression bar and metal supports for key bed. Improved noiseless direct motion pedal action. Improved practice attachment. Full length duet music desk. Carved panels. Instrumental attachment.

The usual way to buy a piano is from a retail agent or dealer. We do not sell our pianos in this way, but supply our pianos direct from our factory to retail purchasers. There are a great many advantages in buying direct from the factory. The most important is the saving in price. We do not employ a single salesman or agent, and we have no salesroom except our factory. We transact all of our business and ship all pianos direct from our factory and our expenses are small, and as we sell a much larger number of pianos than any dealer or retail firm, a very small profit pays us.

No matter how far away you live, our improved system of doing business makes it actually more convenient and more satisfactory to buy a piano from us than to buy one from a local dealer in your own town or city. Write us and receive full particulars. We sell the Wing Piano on easy terms of payment and take old instruments in exchange.

THE JUVENILE COURT IN SESSION, HIS HONOR, JUDGE HORTON, PRESIDING

AMERICA'S PIONEER CHILD-TRIBUNAL

THE Juvenile Court of Chicago, the first child-tribunal of America, is attracting world-wide attention. Not only Illinois' sister States, but foreign countries have sent representatives to study its workings; and copies of the law through which it came into existence, and under which it operates, have been sent upon request to the four quarters of the globe. This law, under the title: "An Act to regulate the Treatment and Control of Dependent, Neglected and Delinquent Children," went into force July 1, 1899. Men and women of all creeds and political affiliations had been instrumental in planning it. The Bar Association of Chicago, assisted by societies interested in children, prepared the bill, and lent its powerful influence to its enactment. The Chairman of the Special Committee which framed it, was Hon. Harvey B. Hurd, who has been called "Father of the Juvenile Court Law"; the Secretary was L. Hastings R. Hart, Superintendent of the Illinois Children's Home and Aid Society, and one of the world's best known specialists in work for children. The purpose of the law is to prevent children under sixteen years of age from being classed as criminals, from being treated as such, from being arrested and kept in confinement in police stations, from being in any way associated with hardened offenders; it seeks to save the child from carrying through life an ineffaceable stigma because of the misdeeds of irresponsible years and evil environment, or because of a condition of vagrancy or dependency, which is its misfortune and not its fault, but for which, under the old law, it could be tried along in the same crowd with thieves and cut-throats, and sent to jail in company with them. While thus giving the "dependent," child shall approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by its parents." The State seeks to raise up out of children of the streets good citizens to serve her, not leaving them to become criminals who shall do her hurt.

WM. O. LAMONT
Clerk of Juvenile Court

JUDGE TUTHILL

T. D. HURLEY
Chief Probation Officer

"neglected" or "delinquent child" a chance for its life, the responsibility is assumed of helping the child to take advantage of opportunities provided. In the last section of the Act this occurs: "The care, custody and discipline of a

The work of inaugurating the Juvenile Court devolved upon Judge Richard S. Tuthill, by virtue of the choice of his brother judges of the Circuit Court of Cook county, and he has been the presiding officer ever since, although our photograph shows Judge Horton serving in his absence, through illness. There are six general probation officers appointed by the court, one of whom is a colored woman, into whose care all the colored children are given. The law made no provision for their salaries, and the Women's Club of Chicago, other feminine organizations, churches and charitable persons have, by their generosity, remedied this shortcoming. The city of Chicago also came to the rescue, when Mayor Harrison detailed as probation officers a number of fatherly and humane men from the police force.

The duty of the probation officers is to investigate cases; to appear with children in court; to be their monitors, friends and guardians. In the case of a delinquent child, the court may continue the hearing from time to time, permitting the child to remain at home subject to the visitation of the probation officer; or he may authorize the officer to board it out, subject to similar oversight. These officers spend whole days visiting their boys, getting reports from their teachers and employers, encouraging and helping their parents. Parents, careless and unworthy, are reasoned with, put on notice and given opportunity to do better by their little ones; if they do not heed the warning, for the sake of society and the child, the latter is placed in more conscientious hands. The first year's record of the court shows the advantage of its system. Of 1,096 boys paroled from the court (that is, allowed to return to their homes under the guardianship of

★ THE ★ COMING ★ INAUGURATION ★

Washington Preparing for the Brilliant Event, which Promises to Eclipse all Previous Ceremonials

If nature wears a smiling-face this 4th of March, the inaugural ceremonies at Washington will surpass anything of the kind that this country has ever seen. A very large sum of money has been expended by the Inauguration Committee in order to make it so, and neither time nor labor has been spared in its preparation.

The merchants of Washington have advanced between $50,000 and $60,000 to defray the expenses, and Congress and the District of Columbia have been correspondingly generous. The electrical display inauguration night will magnificently illustrate the achievements which electricity has attained during the past century.

When a new President is to assume the reins of government, many and rigid are the formalities attending the event. He and his party come to Washington a day or two before the inauguration, and put up at one of the fashionable hotels. On the third of March, the outgoing President comes to call upon him, and although his visit does not consume more than two minutes by the clock, it is a very ceremonious affair, and is returned, with equal brevity, by the President-elect within an hour after it is made. Another formality is the dinner which the President gives to his successor on the evening of that day, and another one still is the luncheon which the outgoing President's wife orders served to the incoming party upon their return from the ceremonies at the Capitol.

Upon the morning of the inauguration, the President-elect, the Vice-President-elect, and the members of the new Cabinet drive from their hotels to the White House, where the outgoing President joins them and takes his place in the carriage, with his successor at his right. They proceed to the Capitol and go to the Senate Chamber, where the Vice-President is to be sworn in. On this occasion the entire executive and legislative branches of the Government are gathered under one roof. There will be the President, the Vice-President, the members of the Cabinet; and if there is a change in the administration, there will be the President-elect and his official family. Besides these, there will be the members of the Senate and House, the heads of the Diplomatic Corps, the Justices of the Supreme Court, the Governors of many of the States, the Lieutenant-General of the Army, the Admiral of the Navy, and a number of other distinguished officers. At no other time is the Government so fully represented at one gathering. When these dignitaries are all seated, and the blind Chaplain has offered the prayer, the Vice-President is sworn in and takes the chair. His first duty is to swear in the new members of the Senate; and when that is done the body adjourns, and every one goes out on the platform in front of the Capitol, and listens to the President take the oath and deliver his inaugural address.

And then begins the triumphal ride back to the White House. The ex-President now sits at the left of the new Executive and appears to neither see nor hear the wild and enthusiastic cheering of the spectators. All along Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth street to the Capitol is a sea of waving flags and bunting; every building is decorated, from every window the stars and stripes are flying. As quickly as possible the drive is made. Upon reaching the Executive Mansion, after taking the oath next Monday, and after a hasty luncheon, President McKinley will take his place upon the reviewing stand in front of the mansion, and during the whole afternoon will review the parade. It will be a most brilliant pageant. General Francis V. Greene of New York is to be chief marshal, and he has arranged for a remarkable procession. Hundreds of troops, cavalry and infantry, both of the regular and volunteer forces are to be in line. The navy will be fully as largely represented, and Admiral Dewey will be in charge of this part of the parade. Almost every Territory and State in the Union is to send political, military, or civic clubs to march, and more than five thousand students are expected to be in line bearing their college colors. The president will have as personal escort his old regiment, the 23d Ohio, and a Cleveland cavalry organization will act as its escort of honor. Numberless bands will be interspersed along the line of march, and they will be so placed that there will not be a lull in the music at any time while the procession is moving.

As gorgeous as the decorations are sure to be and as magnificent as the inaugural parade with its glittering ranks of cavalry, flying banners, escutcheons and flags, the greatest glory of the coming celebration will undoubtedly be at night, when the wonderful electrical displays will flame out against the background of darkness. All of the great government buildings along Pennsylvania avenue will be ablaze with light. Their exteriors are to be outlined with electric bulbs, and every gas jet and electric light within their interiors will be turned on in full force. The Post Office building, midway between the Capitol and White House is to be especially attractive. Its tower will be outlined and festooned with hanging bulbs. Just below it will swing the letters, in red globes, "P. O. D.," and below them Washington, Lincoln and McKinley's pictures will be suspended, surrounded with electric lights. The other buildings will not be far behind the Post Office in splendor. The classical outlines of the Treasury will be visible the full length of the avenue to the Capitol; a huge American shield will ornament the State Department facade; a sixty foot garrison flag will be affixed from the highest point of the War building. Over on the high hills to the north of the city, immense searchlights will throw their penetrating rays upon the Capitol, the Monument, and other points of interest. In the evening, an elaborate display of fireworks will be given in the White Lot near the Monument.

While these things are occurring on the streets, the inauguration ball will be opened. It is to take place in the Pension building in Judiciary square. The building, which has been used for the ball at every inauguration since President Cleveland's second one, contains the largest room in the city. The walls will be covered with cloth-of-gold, and over them will be draped smilax and asparagus vines. Around each of the monolithic granite pillars platforms will be erected and upon these tall palms will be grouped in graduating effects. The rarest of cut flowers will be banked in profusion on the gallery railings, window ledges, a mantel-pieces. In the centre of the corner is a large fountain, which plays in the midst of a miniature lakelet. Its banks will be fern and flower-covered, while its surface will be dotted with floating pond lilies.

At the east of the Pension building a temporary banquet hall has been put up, which will accommodate three thousand guests, and where a buffet supper will be served. On the two afternoons and evenings following inauguration day promenade concerts will be given, in order to allow those who did not care to attend the ball to see the decorations. Washington, D. C. AMERICA'S PIONEER CHILD-TRIBUNAL a probation officer), only 203 were again brought up for offending; out of 256 released from John Worthey School, only 33 were returned. What court, where children are committed to jails with adult prisoners, could show such statistics of reform? The most frequent causes of delinquency are petty thefts, truancy, peddling and begging. The probation officers are on the alert now for the junk man who purchases from children articles he knows they should not have in possession, and also for parents or guardians who send children into saloons to beg. Among dependent children, drunkenness of parents was by far the most prolific cause.

Court is held Monday, Wednesday and Friday, in a room of the Court House set aside for the purpose. Monday morning the dependent cases are heard. The visitor sees a motley group of men, women and babies seated near the door, many nationalities being represented. In front of the desk sit six men on the jury. At their right is a raised platform with two tiers of chairs, occupied by poor, neglected children. At ten, Judge Tuthill takes the bench. Witnesses are called. Cases are heard, sorrowful little stories come out. Some of the children have been found with only a single garment on their backs, hungry, friendless, deserted. Sitting side by side with these will be a child, pretty, refined, well dressed, homeless through the bickerings and quarrelling of parents as to who shall take care of it. Children used to make money in evil ways are there. Parents are present.

If the judge decides that a child should be declared dependent, it is adopted by some family, or it is sent directly to some suitable institution, or is given into the custody of the Children's Home and Aid Society, if Protestant, or the Visitation and Aid Society, if Catholic. On Monday, Wednesday, and Friday afternoons delinquents are tried.

When cases are called, the little fellows, sometimes two or three at a time, go to the judge's desk, and he talks to them in a kind, fatherly way, that ought, to win the confidence of any child. Some of the boys are but nine years old, and only the tops of their heads can be seen above the desk. When Judge Tuthill calls a frightened boy up beside him, pats him on the head, and asks: "Why did you do this, son?" the child usually melts into tears and the truth comes forth. If it is the first offence, the lad may be sent back home on parole and under the supervision of a probation officer. If the judge thinks this disposition not best, he will be sent to

John Worthey School. Very serious cases are committed to the State Reformatory. The judge always talks to the parents, guardians, advising and admonishing them. Very few girl delinquents appear. They are usually sent directly to some good institution for the care of female offenders, the charges being, as a rule, such as are best not disposed of in public.

Movements looking to the establishment of similar courts to this are under way in several other cities. The pictures for this article were taken especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by courtesy of Judge Tuthill, and under the direction of Clerk La Monte. For further aid in presenting this work to its readers THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is indebted to Mr. La Monte, and also to kindly offices of Dr. Graham Taylor, of the Chicago Commons, and to Miss Edith Clark.

A Prisoner who will be a Judge

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON
for March 10: Matt. 26: 37-68

GOLDEN TEXT, Matt. 16: 16:
"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God"

By...
Dr. and Mrs.
Wilbur F. Crafts

MARCH weather is a severe ordeal for body and soul, for health and holiness, for the individual and the church. Even if March "comes in like a lamb," the "lion" is sure to follow close after, and it is "a lion in the way" of Christian enjoyment and Christian work for disciples who are not weherproof. Dr. Alexander, being asked if he enjoyed full assurance of faith, replied that "he thought he did, except when the wind was from the East." Many churches and Sunday Schools close in winter because of the cold, and more close in summer because of the heat. The former freeze up; the latter drop. In Baedeker's Italy, the rivers that flow the year round are marked blue; those that dry up in summer are brown. If Christ-life was mapped on that plan many of us would have a tinge of rust. Our lesson starts with the story of a disciple who was more concerned about the cold than about Christ, and whose religion has spells of freezing up and drying up though afterward he developed the unbroken perseverance and peace that "floweth like a river" deep and wide. The three chief topics of the lesson are:

- Peter's rash venture.
- Jesus the prisoner.
- Christ the judge.

ter followed him afar off to the his priest's palace. Peter means "a rock," but at this time he hadn't even "sand." He was a garden of tropical impulses, that grew and faded in a night, like Jonah's gourd. At sunset, he sat at the Lord's table, when Christ foretold the weakness of his apostles. "Though all should forsake thee, yet will not I." "I will lay down my life for thy sake." "Though I should die with thee yet will I not deny thee." But he had run at the first sight of foes, and now he was veering to follow Christ again, in the hope that he could pass for one of his followers while near enough to "see the end." That April midnight was bitter cold. If he had been a truer disciple he could have had no thought of that when his Lord suffered at hand. But he drew near the open fire where the high priest's attendants and others of the mob were standing, and "warmed himself." He is presently to illustrate, in the danger of evil associations that "disrupt good manners;" 2d, the cowardice of hiding one's faith in Christ, and, especially the sin of weakness or self-confidence. He had forgotten the Psalm: Blessed is the man who dwelleth not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful (Ps. 1). Bitterness came to him by neglecting this warning which he had been taught from childhood, for he first tried to hide his relation to Christ by silence, then by lying, then by swearing. Thrice in words he denied his Lord in swift succession, but bore these, and leading to them, was the deal of silence, when he stood by with no priest while his Lord was maligned and abused, as many a man does to-day. It is so impossible to be at once a coward and a Christian that Christ requires open confession of faith even when it means danger and death. Myr means confessor. How mean then to his our faith when there is nothing worse to fear than a sneer!

As hamed of Jesus! sooner far
Let evening blush to own a star.
Ashamed of Jesus! just as soon
Let midnight be ashamed of noon.

Victorinus, a teacher of rhetoric at Rome in his old age converted to Christianity, as came to Simplicianus, one eminent at the time for his piety, whispering in his ear such these words: "I am a Christian;" but the holy man answered: "I will not believe it, n' count thee so, till I see thee among the Christians in the church;" at which he laughed, saying: "Do then those walls make a Christian? Cannot I be such except I openly profess it, and let the world know the same?" Is he said for fear, being yet a young convert, though an old man; but some time after, when he was more confirmed in the faith, and he seriously considered that if he should continue thus ashamed of Christ, he would be ashamed of him at last, he changed his purpose, and came to Simplicianus, saying: "Let us go to the church, I will now in earnest be a Christian."

ut the chief sin of Peter was his self-confident egotism, that led him into temptations he was not strong enough to resist. What is the difference between the self-reliance we possess and the self-confidence we condemn? Self-confidence is an over-estimate of one's powers, such as led Peter beyond his depth.

Better to run away and stay away as the other apostles did, than to come back to Christ only to deny him. Jesus had told the apostles: "Ye cannot follow me now." It was a cannot of character. He knew they were not yet strong enough for such an ordeal. They would be after Pentecost. But Peter, as often before, thought he knew better than his Lord, and so rushed into battle without counting the cost. He had prayed: "Lead us not into temptation;" but in this case he led himself in. So many a young man or young woman ventures into moral perils when no duty requires it, in spite of the warnings of parents, or pastor, or teacher, saying: "I'll take the risk;" only to fall, perhaps never to rise. In one case it may be going from a Christian country home to a wicked city; in another going into a business where one's associations will be mostly with the wicked, or the busi-grapher arranged another sitting. Again the skull and crossbones appeared in the picture, and the mystified photographer was fairly struck dumb with amazement. Then he noticed the smiling sitter, and finally induced him to tell the joke. The trick simply consisted of painting on the forehead the grim design with a solution of bisulphate of quinine. This is invisible to the eye, but shows pure white to the camera.

History clothes Annas not in white, but in black, with the skull and crossbones of a midnight assassin upon his forehead. Not rank but character determines the judgment of history, the supreme court of this world.

We need not linger upon the trial of Christ with its half truths that were ever the worst falsehoods. Enough that the world has reversed the verdict.

The story is valuable to show how Christ could run a carpenter shop with the beams in his own eyes, chooses rather to be an eye-doctor for the moles in the eyes of others. It is remarkable how many of the stones are thrown from glass houses. We need to judge others with charity, even to judge them with justice, for the tendency of almost everyone, because of his own sinfulness, is to believe every charge of sin against others, and especially when it seems to make some one an equal or greater sinner than himself. Putting another down seems to put us up.

I have said we should judge ourselves more severely, while we judge others more gently. There is force in the prayer of Burns:

O wad some power the giftie gie' us
To see ourselves as ithers see us.

But, in reality, others always see us better or worse than we are. No one can judge us rightly with balanced justice and mercy, save God. When Christ, in a later scene, said to Peter, "Lovest thou me?" the repentant apostle replied, "Thou knowest all things, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee." In this world and the next he is our just and merciful judge.

Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power.

Christ heard the false and frivolous accusations against himself for a while in silence, usually the best answer of the innocent to envious and malicious attacks. But at last the prisoner spoke, not with his head bowed in the shame of guilt, but with the mien of a judge, though bound and bruised and spit upon. He declared that he would sit on the bench of the Supreme Court of the Universe to reverse such unjust judgments as Caiaphas was then contemplating. "He shall come again to be our judge." That word may bring terror to unpardoned evildoers, but it should bring joy to all who have previously accepted Christ as Saviour and Advocate. There was an under-witted, but faith-filled Scotch lad in this country at the time of the great meteoric shower of November, 1833. When, on every side, men and women were that night in terror at the thought that the hour of final doom had come, this lad's mother aroused him from his sleep with a cry: "Sandy, Sandy, get up, will you? The Day of Judgment has come." Instantly the boy was alive to that call, and was on his feet shouting, "Glory to God! I'm ready." In that court no superficial professions will pass muster, but character shall be searched to its depths. In a North Sea island, named Keldive there is a strange lake which has fresh water at the top, in which live fresh water fish, while the depths of the lake are salt and filled with the life of the sea. Nansen found a similar condition in some parts of the Polar Sea. Caiaphas and those about him were godly only in surface forms, with envy and hatred and covetousness and hypocrisy hiding in their deeper nature. Even Peter was at this time only superficially Christianized, the Holy Spirit not having yet displaced the pride and vain-glory of his natural disposition. But he repented and became Christian to the core, faithful unto death. Caiaphas and all of the Sanhedrim, save Joseph and Nicodemus, seem to have carried their sin to the end, and have since stood as guilty prisoners at the court where Christ sits in perfect justice.

Christ the Prisoner Declares He is to be a Judge

"THE COCK CROWED: AND THE LORD TURNED AND LOOKED UPON PETER"—LUKE 22: 61

ness itself may be of a questionable or harmful character. A leading lawyer of Cleveland recently made a strong public protest against having wines furnished for a coming banquet of the Bar Association, citing the fact that many promising young lawyers became intoxicated at banquets where wines are placed at each plate, who do not when wines are furnished only to those who order for themselves. Life is full of incidents like that of this lesson, when all the apostles except Peter escaped by keeping away from temptation, while he fell by a rash self-confidence that was not strength but folly. Better Not is the significant title of Bishop Vincent's book on dangerous amusements.

Lying, swearing Peter is not so wholly lost as he seems. A glance of Christ breaks his heart in penitence, and prepares the way for confidence in Christ to take the place of self-confidence. We will hear great things of him yet.

The chief priests and elders and all the council sought false witnesses.

The Sanhedrim, the supreme court of the Jews, had gathered at night for judicial murder, which they sought to justify by false witnesses. Think of it, a false high priest trying the great High Priest of which he was but a type! On the white cap of Annas were the golden letters: "Holiness to the Lord;" but under it Christ could see "Murder" as his true label.

A college student visited a Philadelphia photographer the other day, and sat for his picture. When the plate was developed, the astonished photographer saw plainly on the young man's forehead a clearly defined death's head with crossbones beneath it. Thinking it was some imperfection in the plate, the photobore every woe of mankind, of which one of the greatest in history has been unjust judgments in and out of courts. How many of the innocent have suffered in such courts as these, of the bloody Jeffreys, and of bloody Mary! And how many of the guilty have escaped through equal injustice and non-enforcement of law! The courts of the United States are the cleanest part of its politics, but how much the poor and weak suffer even in them from the tricks of lawyers and the delays of judges! But the courts of private judgment are yet more frequently unjust, and inflict no less suffering. Therefore, Jesus said, not to magistrates, but to private citizens, "Judge not," a command that few of his disciples did not disobey. It does not mean that we are not to condemn unrighteousness, for in other passages we are called to "judge righteous judgment," but it certainly does forbid much of the hasty judging of our fellows that is so common. We need to judge ourselves more sharply, and others more charitably, reversing our usual opposite course. Many a man that Gleanings. This is a good time to view Peter's life as a whole from its mountain top of rock-firm God trust, as described in Acts 12, when this formerly impulsive, timid apostle, on the same night when he was to be brought forth to die, was "sleeping (like Argyle of a later time) between two soldiers, bound with two chains." If we are like the Peter of an earlier time, rash, cowardly, let us seek in a new Pentecost the steadiness and fearlessness to which he attained.

"Satan hath desired to have thee that he may sift thee as wheat," Jesus had said to the self-confident Peter before his fall, "but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not." On the night of this trial Satan had Peter in his sieve, and seemed to have sifted out all the Peter and left only the Simon, but Christ's prayer expressed in his silent look rescued Peter from the sieve, and started in the tears of penitence the work of recovery. Those tears were like the streams that wash away the sands to leave only the gold, for they washed him of his vain-glory and self-esteem, and made room for the spirit of power.

Counting the Scars

A SERMON BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

TEXT, Gal. 6: 17:
I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus

WE hear much about crowns, thrones, victories, but I now tell the more quiet story of scars, honorable and dishonorable. There are in all parts of the world people bearing dishonorable scars. They went into the battle of sin and were worsted, and to their dying day they will have a scarification of body or mind or soul. It cannot be hidden. There are tens of thousands of men and women now consecrated to God and living holy lives who were once corrupt; but they have been regenerated, and they are no more what they once were than rubescence is emaciation, than balm is vitriol, than noon-day is midnight. But in their depleted physical health or mental twist or style of temptation, they are ever and anon reminded of the obnoxious past. They have a memory that is deplorable. In some twinge of pain or some tendency to surrender to the wrong which they must perpetually resist, they have an unwholesome reminiscence. They carry scars, deep scars, ignoble scars.

But Paul in my text shows us a scarification which is a badge of honorable and self-sacrificing service. He had in his weak eyes the result of too much study, and in his body, bent and worn, the signature of scourgings and shipwrecks and maltreatment by mobs. In my text he shows those scars as he declares: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." Notice that it is not wounds but scars, and a scar is a healed wound. Before the scar is well defined upon the flesh the inflammation must have departed, and right circulation must have been restored, and new tissue must have been formed. It is a permanent indentation of the flesh—a cicatrix. Paul did well to show those scars. They were positive and indisputable proofs that with all his body, mind, and soul he believed what he said. They were his diploma, showing that he had graduated from the school of hardship for Christ. They were credentials proving his right to lead in the world's evangelization.

Honorable Scars

Men are not ashamed of scars gotten in battle for their country. No American is embarrassed when you ask him, "Where did you get that gash across your forehead?" and he can answer, "That was from a sabre cut at San Juan." When you ask some German, "Where did you lose your right arm?" he is not ashamed to say, "I lost it at Sedan." When you ask an Italian, "Where did you lose your eye?" he is not annoyed when he can answer, "I suffered that in the last battle under our glorious General Garibaldi." But I remind you of the fact that there are scars not gotten in war which are just as illustrious. We had in this country years ago an eminent advocate who was called into the Presidential Cabinet as Attorney General. In mid-life he was in a Philadelphia court-room engaged in an important trial. The attorney on the opposite side of the case got irritated and angry, and in most brutal manner referred to the distinguished attorney's disfigured face, a face more deeply scarred than any face I ever saw. The legal hero of whom I am speaking, in his closing argument said: "Gentlemen of the jury, when I was a little child I was playing with my sister in the nursery, and her clothes caught fire, and I ran to her to put out the fire. I succeeded; but I myself took fire, and before it was extinguished my face was awfully burned, and as black as the heart of the scoundrelly counsel, who on the other side of the case has referred to my misfortune." The eminent attorney of whom I speak carried all his life the honorable scar of his sister's rescue. Albert Barnes, the most distinguished of all commentators, unless it be Matthew Henry, for years at four o'clock in the morning, might have been seen going from his house in Philadelphia to his study in the church, and in those early hours and before breakfast, wrote all those wonderful commentaries, a theological library in themselves. He said that as he was pastor he felt bound to give all the rest of each day to work connected with his pastorate; but at what a ruinous draught upon his eyesight he did that early morning work, first by candlelight and then by gaslight! When he got through those wonderful volumes of Scriptural exposition Albert Barnes was a blind man. Scars, illustrious scars, on his extinguished eyesight!

Literary Martyrdom

A young college student in England found all the artistic world in derisive pursuit of William Turner, the painter. The young graduate took up his pen—in some respects the most brilliant pen that was ever put to paper—and wrote those five great volumes on modern painting, the chief thought of which was his defense of the abused painter. The heroic author by some was supposed in his old days to be cynical and fault-finding, and when I saw him a little while before his death he was in decadence; but I know that all his face and all over his manner were the scars of heroic defense. In the seventies of his lifetime he was suffering from the wounds and fatigues of the twenties. Long after he had quit the battle with author's pen and painter's pencil he bore the scars of literary martyrdom.

But why do we go so far for illustration, when I could take right out of the memories of some whom I address instances just as appropriate? To rear aright for God and heaven a large family of children in that country home was a mighty undertaking. Far away from the village doctor, the garret must contain the herbs for the cure of all kinds of disorders. Through all infantile complaints the children of that family went. They missed nothing in the way of childish disorders. Busy all day was that mother in every form of housework, and twenty times a night, called up by the children, all down at the same time with the same contagion. Her hair is white a long while before it is time for snow. Her shoulders are bent long before the appropriate time for stooping. Spectacles are adjusted, some for close by and some for far off, years before you would have supposed her eyes would need re-enforcement. Here and there is a short grave in her pathway, this headstone bearing the name of this child, and another headstone bearing the name of another child. Hardly one bereavement lifts its shadow than another bereavement drops one. After thirty years of wifehood and motherhood the path turns toward the setting sun. She cannot walk so far as she used to. Colds caught hang on longer than formerly. Some of the children are in the heavenly world, for which they were well prepared through and others in this world doing honor to their ancestry. When her life closes and the neighbors gather for her obsequies the officiating clergyman may find appropriate words in the last chapter of Proverbs: "Her price is far above rubies. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil. She will do him good, and not evil, all the days of her life. She stretcheth out her hand to the poor. She is not afraid of the snow for her household; for all her household are clothed with scarlet. Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders in the land. Her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her. Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all." Then after the Scripture lesson is read let all come up, and before the casket is closed look for the last time at the scars of her earthly endurance. She never heard the roll of a gun-carriage or saw a banner hoisted upon a parapet, but she has in all the features of that dear old face the marks of many a conflict—scars of toil, scars of maternity, scars of self-sacrifice, scars of bereavement. She is a heroine whose name has never been heard of ten miles from the old homestead, but her name is inscribed high up among the enthroned immortals.

People think they must look for martyrs on battle-fields, or go through a history to find burnings at the stake and tortures on racks when there are martyrs all about us. At this time in this capital city there are scores of men wearing themselves out in the public service. In ten years they will not have a healthy nerve left in their body. In committee rooms, in consultations that involve the welfare of the nation, under the weight of great responsibilities, their vitality is being subtracted. In almost every village of the country you find some broken-down state or national official. After exhausting himself in the public service,

Rough American Politics

kicks him out of congress, or cabinet, or legislative hall, and he goes into comparative obscurity and comparative want, for he has been long enough away from home to lose his professional opportunities. No man that was ever put to death by sword or instrument of torture was more of a martyr than that man who has been wrung to death by the demands of official position. The scars may not be visible, for there are scars on the brain, and scars on the nerve, and scars on the heart, but nevertheless are they scars, and God counts them and their reward will be abundant.

It is easy for some Washington correspondents, writing home to their city or village newspapers, to misrepresent our public men, and represent them as living in idleness and luxury; but I tell you from my own observation that many of the Representatives in Congress, and Senators of the United States, and Justices of the Supreme Court, and Secretaries of Presidential Cabinets work as hard, if not harder, than any day laborer breaking cobble-stones on a New Jersey turnpike, or a driver of mules on a towpath for a Pennsylvania canal boat. What with the solicitations for appointments by constituents who swarm around State and national capital, and the social exhaustions, and the irritating interruptions, and the unreasonable demands of all kinds, high official position is not a sinecure. Their indigestions and neuralgias and premature old age are scars that God will honor, though the world may never appreciate.

The heroes and the heroines of any war are not always at the front, are not always epauleted, are not always acquainted with military tactics, and some of them would not know how to present arms or ground arms or stack arms. Some of them rendered their

some by doing harder work on the farm while the bread-winner was at Gettysburg. We all know the names of the distinguished Northern and Southern women who bound up the wounds of the battlefields, but there were ten thousand women just as brave who never left the farmhouse or cotton plantation, and who were so worn out in taking care of their bereft homes that when the soldier came home they had only strength left to die. And the places where they sleep the last sleep are not marked with so much as a plain slab, while those who suffered not half so much are in sculptured mausoleum.

In all lands there are veterans of war who may not have had their face scarred with one bullet, or their foot lamed by a bursting shell, and who could not roll up their sleeve and show you one mark suggestive of battle, yet carry with them weaknesses gotten in exposures to disease along malarial swamps, or from miles of marching, and ever and anon they feel a twinge of pain, each recurrence of which is sharper or more lasting, and after a while, they will be captured for tomb by disorders which started twenty or thirty, or forty years before. And these scars are all unseen by human eyes; those people are as certainly of war as though they had been blown up in an undermined fortress or thrust through with a cavalryman's lance. We want to make out is that there are scars which are never counted except as counts them, and I want to enlarge your sympathies.

There is a woman who has suffered domestic injustice of which there is no cognizance. She says nothing about an inquisitor's machine of torture could not wring from her the story of domestic woe. Ever since the day of orange blossoms and long white veil, she has done her full duty, and received for it harshness and blame and neglect. The marriage ring, that was supposed to be a symbol of unending affection, has turned out to be one link of a chain of horrible servitude. A wreath of nettle and nightshade of brightest form would have been a more accurate prophecy. There are those who find it hard to believe that there is such a place as hell, but you could go right in any community and find more than hell of domestic torment. There is escape for that woman but the grave, that, compared with the life she now lives will be an arbor of jasmine and of humming bird's song poured into the bowl of the honeysuckle. Scars! If there were none on the brow showing where he struck her arriving home from midnight carousals, nevertheless there are scars all up and down her injured and immortal soul which will be remembered on the day when they shall leap forth for her avengement like live thunderbolts of an incensed God. When we see a veteran in any land who has lost a limb in battle, our sympathies are stirred; but, oh, how many have in domestic realm lost their life, and yet denied a pillow of dust on which to slumber! Better enlarge your roll of martyrs. Better adopt a new mode of counting human scarifications. A broken bone is not half as bad as a broken heart.

Apostolic Scars

There are many who can, in the same sense that Paul uttered it, say: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." That is, for the sake of Christ and because they carry scars which keep them indure through all time and all eternity. Do you think that Paul was accurate when he said that? If you have studied his career you have no doubt of it. In youth he learned how to fashion the robes of the Cilician goat into canvas, a quack trade, and then went to college, the president of which was Gamaliel, an institution which scholars say could not have been very thorough, because of what they call Paul's imperfect command of Greek syntax. But his history became exciting on the road to Damascus, where he was unhorsed and blinded. His conversion was a convulsion. Whether that fall from the horse may have left a mark upon him I know not, but the mob soon took advantage of him and flogged and imprisoned and mistreated him, until he had scars more than enough to assure the truthfulness of his utterance: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus."

All of Paul's suffering was for Christ.

see. He had intellectual powers which could have achieved for him all worldly successes. You see what he could do in a court-room, when, with extemporaneous speech, he made the judicial bench tremble; when on Mars' Hill he confounded the Athenian critics; when he preached amid the excitement of a tumbling penitentiary; when in a storm at sea he took command of the ship, the only one on hand cool-headed. With his inspired pen, and his

all power of illustration, and his capacity to move audiences, and his spirit of defiance, there was no height of worldly power he might not have gained. What Hannibal was to an army, what Draco was in making laws, what Homer was to poetry, what Demosthenes was in power of persuasion, what Socrates was to philosophy, what Aeschylus was to the drama, what Paul might have been to all centuries. God never before and never since made another human being like him. But with all this capacity and opportunity of achieving worldly renown, he turns his back on home and becomes an exile; on banquet tables, and eats his hard crust by the roadside; on the pleasure yachts he sailed the Mediterranean, and embarked on a freight boat from Alexandria; on scholars in Athens, and talks to fishermen. Instead of plaudits of aroused and enthusiastic assemblages, he addresses audiences that talked back, and asked insolent questions, and broke up in a riot. Instead of garlands flung at his feet, they flung stones upon his head. Five times he was scourged, at each whipping thirty-nine strokes, the fortieth stroke spared him from mercy, but because forty strokes were the severest punishment the law allowed, and they feared, through counting wrong, they might make it forty-one, and so themselves be punished. Why, Paul must have been scarred all over, and he only tells the plain truth without any commentary when he declares, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." I was as much as to say, "See those leg scars? There is where they whipped me. See you that ugly indenture? There is where they stoned me. See you that circling scar on my wrist? There is where they handcuffed me. See those ugly curves around my ankles? There is where they made my feet fast in the stocks." There are many who, like that apostolic martyr, have on them the mark of the Lord Jesus. There is the great army of foreign missionaries, sometimes maligned by dissolute American, English, and Scotch merchants, who at Hongkong and Calcutta and Constantinople have had their wickedness reproved by the pure home life of those missionaries. There is the great army of the ministers of the Gospel, now in heaven, who, on small salaries, and amid fatigues that slew them, served their day and generation. There is another great army of private Christians who, in Sabbath schools, and in tract distribution, and in humanitarian and evangelistic efforts, have put their life in sacrifice on the altars of God. There is another army of Christian invalids who lost their life in overwork for the church and the world's redemption. People call their illness neuralgia, or nervous prostration, or insomnia, or paresis, or premature old age. I call their ailments scars, as my text calls them scars. There may be scars on the memory, scars on the spirits, scars on the courage, scars on the soul, as well as scars on the body, and those invisible to the human eye are as honorable as those visible.

How the Scars Came

"All ye who bear in your body the marks of the Lord Jesus! have you thought what use those marks will be in the heavenly world? What source of glorious reminiscence! In that world you will sit together and talk over earthly experiences. 'Where did you get that scar?' saint will say to saint, and there will come back a story of hardship and struggle and persecution and wounds and victory through the grace of the Gospel. Another spirit will say to listening spirit: 'Where did you get that hurt so plainly marked?' And the answer will be: 'O that was one of the worst hurts I ever had. That was a broken friendship. We were in sweetest accord for years, together in joy and sorrow. What one thought the other thought. We were David and Jonathan. But our personal interests parted, and our friendships broke never to be renewed on earth. But we have made it all up here, and misunderstandings are gone, and we are in the same heaven, on neighboring thrones, in neighboring castles, on the banks of the same river.' 'Where did you get that mark?' says another spirit to listening spirit, and the answer comes: 'That is a reminder of a great bereavement, of a desolated household, of a deep grave, of all the heart strings at one stroke snapped altogether. But you see it is no longer a laceration, for the wound has been healed, and my once bereft spirit is now in companionship with the one from whom for a while I was separated.' 'Where did you get that long, deep scar?' says another immortal to listening immortal, and the answer comes: 'That was the awful fatigue of a life-time struggle in attempting, amid adverse circumstances, to achieve a livelihood. For thirty years I was tired, O, so tired. But you see it is a healed wound, for I have found rest at last for body and soul, the complete rest, the everlasting rest that I heard of before I came here as the rest that remaineth for the people of God.' Some one in heaven will say to martyr John Rogers: 'Where did you get that scar on your foot?' and the answer will come: 'O, that was a burn I suffered when the flames of martyrdom were kindled beneath me.' 'Ignatius, what is that mark on your cheek?' 'O, that was made by the paw of the lion to which I was thrown by the order of Trajan.' Some one will say to Paul: 'Great Apostle, that must have been a deep cut once, the mark which I see on your neck.' And Paul says: 'That was made by the sword which struck me at my beheading on the road to Ostia.' But we all have scars of some kind, and those are some of the things we will talk over in the heavenly world while we celebrate the grace that made us triumphant over all antagonism.

Need of Courage

Now what is the practical use of this subject? It is the cultivation of Christian heroics. The most of us want to say things and do things for God when there is no danger of getting hurt. We are all ready for easy work, for popular work, for compensating work, but we all greatly need more courage to brave the world and brave Satanic assault when there is something aggressive and bold and dangerous to be undertaken for God and righteousness. And if we happen to get hit, what an ado we make about it. We all need more of the stuff that martyrs are made out of. We want more sanctified grit, more Christian pluck, more holy recklessness as to what the world may say and do in any crisis of our life. Be right and do right, and all earth and hell combined cannot put you down.

The same little missionary who wrote my text also uttered that piled-up magnificence to be found in those words which ring like battle-axes on splitting helmets: "In all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us; for I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Badges of Service

How do you like that, you cowards, who shrink back from aggressive work, and if so much as a splinter pierce your flesh, cry out louder than many a one torn in auto-da-fe. Many a soldier has gone through a long war, been in twenty battles, led a regiment up a hill mounted by cannon, and swept by musketry, and yet came home without having been once hit, and without a mark upon him. But it will not be so among those who pass in the grand review of heaven. They have all in the holy wars been wounded, and all bear scars. And what would the newly arrived in heaven do with nothing to show that he had ever been struck by human or diabolic weaponry. How embarrassed and eccentric such an one in such a place! Surely he would want to be excused awhile from the heavenly ranks and be permitted to descend to earth, crying, "Give me another chance to do something worthy of an immortal. Show me some post of danger to be manned, some fortress to be stormed, some difficult charge to make. Like Leonidas at Thermopylae; like Miltiades at Marathon; like Marlborough at Blenheim; like Godfrey at Jerusalem; like Winkelried at Sempach gathering the spears of the Austrian knights into his bosom, giving his life for others; show me some place where I can do a brave thing for God. I cannot go back to heaven until somewhere I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." My hearer, my reader, quit complaining about your misfortunes and disappointments and troubles, and through all time and all eternity thank God for scars!

Thy saints in all this glorious war
Shall conquer though they die:
They see the triumph from afar
And seize it with their eye.
When that illustrious day shall rise,
And all thine armies shine,
In robes of victory through the skies
The glory shall be thine.

POOR JACK'S QUIET PORT ...THE GOOD WORK ACCOMPLISHED BY THE SCANDINAVIAN SAILORS' HOME IN BROOKLYN

Among those who go "down to the sea in ships," the Scandinavian sailor stands out in strong relief. He is hardy and skillful, a clever navigator, and noted for sobriety, honesty and loyalty. His is a simple nature, however, and liable to be imposed upon by the various schemers who are the sailors' worst enemies ashore. Twelve years ago, the Scandinavian Sailors' Home was started in Brooklyn. In that time, many hundreds of sailors have been housed, clothed, fed, and lifted out of debauched and immoral surroundings into a clean and elevating atmosphere. They have gone from doors sober, industrious, self-reliant, and their lives brightened and helped.

H. OSMUNDSEN, SUPT.

The sailor's worst enemy, when he gets ashore, is the saloon and cheap lodgings, where his hard-earned wages are spent in dissipation and debauchery. All sorts of pitfalls are laid for him by the purveyors of these low places, to cheat him out of his money, and then turn him out. In the course of a year, hundreds of sailors drift into the Bowery and other New York streets of the same kind, and when they have spent all, they frequently terminate their "shore leave" in the police station or on Blackwell's Island.

It was to reach men of this class that the Scandinavian Sailors' Home was started.

A large double house was purchased on Carroll street, Brooklyn, in a good residential section of the city. On the first floor are the offices, where the sailormen can find all conveniences for exchanging money, sending telegrams, telephone messages, buying steamship tickets, and other matters which would ordinarily take them outside among strangers and sharpers. The men are shown the advantages of laying away a part of their earnings. A safe is kept in the office, where they may leave money or valuables for safe-keeping. The other rooms on this floor are a large dining-room, a kitchen and pantry. On the second floor is a large reading and meeting-room, where well-attended religious services are held every Sunday, and during the week a family prayer service evenings, most of the men being away during the day. Religious papers and magazines are to be found in the reading-room, as well as the daily papers. At present the supply of books is very small, but the management is making an effort to have it increased. Across the hall from the library is the superintendent's office, a neat comfortable little room.

During the past year 1,055 seamen have been guests at the Home, and $11,301.04 have been forwarded through its office to the relatives and friends of seamen abroad. If a man be idle and cannot pay he is not turned out, but kept until he is able to secure work, when he is expected to pay. Seamen are given credit every year, for board and other necessities, to the amount of many hundreds of dollars.

The Home is incorporated, and among its officers and directors are some of the leading Scandinavian merchants and sea captains in the United States. It is supported largely by voluntary contributions from various sources. Every year shows an increase in the spiritual work as well as in the material advantages it brings to the many friendless Scandinavian sailors who visit the port of New York in sea-going craft from all parts of the world.

How Long Should Ministers Stay?

CLERGYMEN and laymen and editors are ever and anon discussing the subject—a most practical question and easy to answer. Let a minister stay in a place till he gets done—that is, when he has nothing more to say or do. Some ministers are such ardent students of the Bible and of men, they are after a twenty-five years' residence in a parish so full of things that ought to be said, that their resignation would be a calamity. Others get through in three months and ought to go; but it takes an earthquake to get them away. They must be moved on by committees, and pelted with resolutions, stuck through with the needles of the ladies' sewing society, and hauled up before presbyteries and consociations; and after they have killed the church and killed themselves, the pastoral relation is dissolved. We knew of a man who got a unanimous call. He wore the finest pair of gaiters that ever went into that pulpit; and when he took up the Psalm-book to give out the song, it was the perfection of gracefulness. His tongue was dipped in "balm of a thousand flowers," and it was like the roll of one of Beethoven's symphonies to hear him read the hardest Bible names, Jeconiah, Zerubbabel and Tiglath-pileser. It was worth all the salary paid him to see the way he lifted his pocket-handkerchief to his eyelids.

But that brother, without knowing it, got through in six weeks. He had sold out his entire stock of goods, and ought to have shut up shop. Congregations enjoy flowers and well-folded pocket-handkerchiefs for occasional desserts, but do not like them for a regular meal. The most urbane elder was sent to the minister to intimate that the Lord was probably calling him to some other field, but the elder was baffled by the graciousness of his pastor, and unable to discharge his mission, and after he had for an hour hemmed and hawed, backed out. Next, a woman with very sharp tongue was sent to talk to the minister's wife. The war-cloud thickened, the pickets were driven in, and then a skirmish, and after a while all the batteries were opened, and each side said that the other side lied, and the minister dropped his pocket-handkerchief and showed claws as long as those of Nebuchadnezzar after he had been three years eating grass like an ox.

We admire long pastorates when it is agreeable to both parties, but we know ministers who boast they have been thirty years in one place, though all the world knows they have been there twenty-nine years too long. Their congregations are patiently waiting their removal to a higher latitude. Meanwhile, those churches are like a man with chronic rheumatism, very quiet—not because they admire rheumatism, but because there is no use kicking with a swollen foot, since it would hurt them more than the object assaulted. If a pastorate can be maintained only through conflict or ecclesiastical tyranny, it might better be abandoned.

Peace in Zion

THE cheerfulness and good humor which now characterize our church courts is remarkable and in strong contrast with the old-time ecclesiastical fights, which shook synods and conferences. Religious controversies have always been the most bitter of all controversies; and when ministers do fight, they fight like vengeance. Once a church court visiting a place would not only spend much of their own time in sharp contention, but would leave the religious community to continue the quarrel after adjournment. Now they have a time of good cheer while in convention, and leave only one dispute behind them among the families, and that arising from the fact that each one claims it had the best ministers and elders at their house. Contention is a child of the darkness, Peace the daughter of the light. The only help for a cow's hollow horn is a gimlet-hole bored through it, and the best way to cure religious combatants is to let more Gospel light through their antlers.

Prepare for a Rainy Day

NEXT to the evil of living beyond one's means, is that of spending all one's income. There are multitudes who are sailing so near shore, that a slight wind in the wrong direction founders them. They get on well while the times are usual and the wages prompt paid; but a panic or a short period of sickness and they drop helpless. Many a father has gone with his family in a fine carriage drawn by a spanking team till he came up to his grave; then he lay down on his pillow of dust, and his children have got out of the carriage, and not only been compelled to walk, but to go barefoot. Against parsimony and niggardliness I proclaim war, but with the same sentence I condemn those who make a grand splash while they live, leaving their families in destitution when they die.

Attend Prayer-Meetings

A WEEK-NIGHT meeting widens the pulpit till all the people can stand on it. Such a service tests one's piety. No credit for going to church on Sabbath. Places of amusement are all closed, and there is no money to be made. But week-nights every kind of temptation and opportunity spreads before a man, and if he goes to the praying circle he must give up these things. The man who goes to the weekly service regularly, through moonlight and pitch darkness, through good walking and slush ankle-deep, will, in the book of judgment, find it set down to his credit. He will have a better seat in heaven than the man who went only when the walking was good, and the weather comfortable, and the service attractive, and his health perfect. That service which costs nothing God accounts as worth nothing. The week-night service gives additional opportunity for religious culture, and we find it so difficult to do right and be right that we cannot afford to miss any opportunity. Such a service is a lunch between the Sabbath meals, and if we do not take it we get weak and faint. A truth coming to us then ought to be especially effective. If you are on a railroad train and stop at the depot, and a boy comes in with a telegram, all the passengers lean forward and wonder if it is for them. It may be news from home. It must be urgent, or it would not be brought there. Now, if while we are rushing on in the whirl of every-day excitement, a message of God meets us, it must be an urgent and important message. If God speaks to us in a meeting mid-week, it is because there is something that needs to be said before next Sunday.

... A FLIGHT IN THE DESERT ...

The Thrilling Story of the Christian Missionaries' Escape from China Across the Sands of Gobi.

WHEN the complete story of the perils and privations endured by our faithful missionaries in China, during the Boxer rebellion, has been told, it will disclose to the world many instances of heroic self-sacrifice and splendid courage. Not even the fate of their brothers and sisters who had been martyred by the fanatical mobs, deterred the survivors from doing their duty, and it was not until slaughter and conflagration surrounded them on all sides that any of the missionaries could be induced to leave their posts and seek a refuge beyond the reach of the infuriated multitudes.

Few experiences are more exciting than those that fell to the lot of the party of missionaries who escaped from Kalgan and fled across the great Gobi desert, through Mongolia to Siberia. The story of their flight is told by the Rev. Mark Williams. After leaving the Mission compound at Kalgan, where the mobs had full sway, the fugitives learned that not only their station, but a large part of the town, had been burned and pillaged. Their lives, had they remained a day longer, would have been sacrificed unquestionably. Mr. Williams, in a later date, June 11, 1900, thus describes the flight:

"We made hurried preparations. The school girls and Christian women were sent away to Gardener Jen's, on the other side of the river, whence they could escape unnoticed to their homes. The servants all bade us good-by, and a guard of soldiers stood ready to watch the place. None of us slept, between packing and planning. We put a few necessary articles in trunks, collected bedding and clothing, and at 3 A.M. stole out, Mr. and Mrs. Sprague, Dr. Murdock, Miss Engh, Mr. Roberts and I. We found our way across the fields, and reached the Yamen before light. After some time, the gates were opened for us. . . . The mandarin told us that he could not protect us, and we must leave that night for Mongolia. We had a prayer-meeting together, and prayed as those who knew not but their end had come. We repeated verses, and I the Traveler's Psalm, which we have so often used together:

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills,
From whence cometh my help,
My help cometh from the Lord,
Which made heaven and earth."

"After midnight the soldiers came, and our boxes and provisions were placed on three carts. It was a mild, moonlight night. We had twelve mounted soldiers as escorts. As we were near the Great Gate, we saw about fifty armed men. We thought of Boxers, but found that they were an extra guard of soldiers to see us safely out of China. The city gate of Kalgan is a northern gate of the Great Wall, and opens out into Mongolia.

"We traveled rapidly. The ladies rode horseback part of the time. At seven o'clock, on the morning of June 12, we reached a village, and dropped on the kang at an inn to sleep, as we had been under excitement, and had no sleep for two nights.

"We went on to the Mongol plains, and halted at the encampment of the Lama Brothers. They entertained us, but seemed unfriendly, and wanted us to leave the next day. We began to fear that we would not be allowed to stay even in Mongolia, as they told us that the Boxers were all around."

On being informed by the Lama Brothers that they would have to move on, they joined a Swedish party who were on their way to Urga. Some difficulty was found in getting a caravan, but finally one was engaged which had been intended for a member of the British Legation. The caravan presented a very picturesque appearance, with its five awkward camels leading the procession, followed by twelve horses and ten baggage camels, and trailing behind was a baby carriage. Two of the men folks followed behind on foot, driving two unruly sheep before them, and missionary Larsen rode on his bicycle. This was the appearance of the party as they began the most trying part of their extraordinary journey. It numbered thirty, including seven Mongols.

On Saturday night following the start, the caravan stopped at a Mongol encampment. The Mongols were very hospitable and offered their snuff-bottles to be smelled and returned, which is a custom with them just as hand-shaking is with us. An old Mongol teacher brought milk for the children and treated the older ones to Mongol tea, a mixture of fat, salt, flour and roasted millet, with a flavor of poor tea. The Mongol women dress like men, wear heavy hide boots, and go galloping over the plains on horseback, the long ribbons of their hats streaming behind them.

Leaving the Mongol camp, the party pressed on to the famous "Sea of Sand," the Chinese call it, on account of its constantly moving dunes. The name appears to be a very good one, for from a distance the Gobi desert does look very much like a sea. Although the route chosen was one that had been used by caravans for ages, scarcely vegetation was to be found. They were the telegraph poles along the way were numbered. It takes twenty-four poles for a mile, so they could reckon how far they were traveling. The moon went down and baggage camels got ahead and the party, one time lost the way, but quickly found again.

By day the sun beating down upon the sands, made the heat almost unbearable; the traveling was done at night, and during the day they rested and ate. Cooking attended to by a committee of two men and one woman, who prepared all the meals for the entire caravan. The desert journey is a most trying one, but as God's providence brought them there, they knew it was his of saving their lives, and thought it ungrateful to repine at having to endure trouble. Sunday was always welcome as a day of rest.

One can scarcely appreciate the value of water in such a place. The party made all-night journeys to reach a well and on arriving found that mongols had followed them to see that they put no poison in the water. Crowds of men and animals surrounded the well and a long train of ox-carts laden with hides and wool was passed on the road to it.

After tedious traveling, the caravan reached the telegraph station at Oude, one-half of the way to Urga. The station is a frail building at the base of a mountain. When the caravan stopped near there, a storm came up and filled the air with dust and sand. There the operators informed the party that the majority of the missionaries were safe in Shanghai. Despite torrents of rain which were falling, the travelers returned to the camp, which had been blown flat and now covered with sand, and sang joyful songs an hour after eating their supper.

After long marches the fugitives found the camels' feet wore out, and had to be patched by sewing on pieces of leather, fastened to a thong which is drawn under the thick skin of the sole.

After thirty-eight days of travel, Urga was reached at last. All were invited to the Russian consulate; so, with nineteen horsemen, twenty camels, twenty-three foreigners and seven Mongols, the party took possession of fourteen rooms assigned them, and were treated with great hospitality. In a letter dated July 30, Mr. Williams describes the town of Urga:

"Urga is inhabited by 10,000 Lamas. I passed the meat and horse markets. Small shops were to be seen everywhere, under which were large prayer wheels, each revolving on an axis. People pass through these sheds in succession, each giving the wheel a whirling prayer. Prayers are written on slips of paper wound around the wheel, so each revolution counts as a prayer. On almost every hill by the roadside, we saw piles of stone thrown up by the Mongols as prayers to the god of the mountain. On the piles are little flags of silk, fluttering. Each flutter signifies a prayer."

A great Mongol festival was to be held in Urga in a few days, when several hundred thousand Mongols would be gathered there, and the Chinese official declared that he could not be responsible for the safety of the missionaries. They reluctantly started for Kiachta, two hundred and fifty miles further, a journey of two weeks. Before setting out they cabled to Boston for funds to return to America.

Instead of Chinese money, bricks of tea were used at Urga, four bricks being equivalent to a Russian rouble, or fifty cents. Half bricks and small pieces of silk constitute the small currency.

On August 13, 1900, the travelers crossed over from the Chinese into the Russian Empire at Kiachta. "For two months," writes Mr. Williams, "we had slept on the ground and dwelt in tabernacles, like the patriarchs of old. It has been forty-nine days since we commenced journeying from Hara, through the wide and terrible wilderness, the pillar of cloud has preceded us, and we have come safely to our Canaan."

At Kiachta a telegram awaited them, giving orders for £300 to take them home. A five days' journey brought them to Lake Baikal where they got a steamer to Irkutsk. From there they went by the Trans-Siberian Railway to St. Petersburg. They reached New York October 8th.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Grand Pageant

THE opening of the British Parliament by the new King on February 14, was made the occasion of a brilliant spectacle. King Edward went in magnificent state from his palace to the House of Lords, through crowds of admiring citizens. The huge carriage of glass and gold, drawn by eight cream-colored Hanoverian horses, in which twenty years ago Queen Victoria went to open Parliament in state for the last time, was used for the occasion. On entering the building, the King went to the robing-room, where he put on the royal ermine robe. Thence preceded by the Duke of Devonshire, carrying the crown on a cushion, the King went to the splendid robing-chamber in which the Lords hold their sessions. Having conducted Queen Alexandra to her throne, he took his seat on his own throne. The chamber was crowded with all the rank and fashion of the kingdom. A large space usually occupied by the legislators was reserved for ladies, whose sombre mourning garments were in vivid contrast to the red robes of the peers and the white surplices of the shops. A message was sent to the House of Commons requiring the presence of the Speaker and members to hear the address from the throne. On their arrival, the Lord Chancellor administered the customary oath to the King, in which he declared himself a Protestant, and announced his disbelief in the characteristic doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. He then signed the roll pledging himself to protect the rights and liberties of the Parliament and the people. These formalities finished, the King read the brief document describing the national situation and the proposed legislation, in a clear voice. He spoke throughout of her late majesty as his "beloved mother," an expression of touching homeliness on an occasion of so much grandeur. The paragraph relating to the South African war was, of course, the chief point of interest, and the friends of the Boers everywhere would note that the King referred hopefully to the time when it would be possible to establish in the two colonies "the institutions which will secure the equal rights of all the white inhabitants and protection and justice for the native population." The only other matter which excited interest was the announcement that the King placed at the disposal of Parliament the revenues belonging by hereditary right to the Sovereign, and an intimation that the Houses could be expected to provide him an income sufficient for his expenses. This was done by the late Queen, and proved to be convenient for her and a source of profit to the nation. The short speech ended with the words: "I pray that Almighty God may continue to guide you in the conduct of your deliberations, and that he may bless them with success." His Majesty then led the Queen back to the robing-room, where they divested themselves of their magnificent robes, and, entering the royal coach, returned to their palace. Both going and returning the King was heartily cheered by the thousands of spectators. Among them, doubtless, were many Christian people who, remembering how much moral danger and temptation surround a monarch, are praying that the Scriptural ideal of a royal life may be fulfilled in the reign of the new King:

Take away the wicked from before the King, and his throne shall be established in righteousness (Prov. 25: 5).

A Mother's Daring

A deed of heroism was performed a few days ago in the upper part of New York City by a small, weak woman, which would have been more than many a strong man would have undertaken. She was having a dress made by a dress-maker, who lived on the opposite side of the street and she went to have it tried on. She left two children, a boy aged five and a girl aged three, in her flat, promising to return soon. While she was attending to the business, she heard the fire engines pass and looked out. She saw them stop near the house in which she lived and immediately hurried home. To her consternation, she learned that it was her home that was on fire. She broke through the firemen, who tried to prevent her entering, and ran up the stairs. The hallways were already blazing, but the heroic woman gathered up her skirts and ran through the flames. Seizing her two children, she ran back. She felt her clothing burning; but, holding the children so as to protect them, she kept on her way down to the street. There her burning garments were extinguished, but she was so badly burned that it was necessary to send her to a hospital. Even then, all her concern was for the safety of her children. She made little of what she had done, though she had imperilled her own life for her babes. It is by such acts that we realize not only the depth of can do as I please about the gas fixtures, I suppose.' 'Very true,' he said blandly. 'I only happen to be the owner of the house, and I should prefer not to have the fixtures removed, as doing so might injure the walls. I will have it done if you wish, and will have a gas-fitter come here at once.' Then he very politely bowed himself out of the door, and I was left considerably abashed. Then it dawned on me that I had given him a quarter for his work about the house. Now I feel as if I never wanted to face him again, for he is a man worth very close to a million dollars. It was only another incident tending to show how little one can judge of people by outward appearances." Even yet the lady does not appear to have learned her lesson fully. She easily realized that a millionaire was entitled to respect, but there are other and better claims that she ought to recognize if she would follow the Divine example:

Man looketh on the outward appearance but the Lord looketh on the heart (I. Samuel 16: 7).

Shipwrecked Crew Saved

The Atlas steamer Alleghany brought to New York last week the captain and crew of a vessel which had foundered on would be crowded to hear the tidings of salvation!

He is able to save them to the uttermost that come to God by him (Heb. 7: 25).

A Nameless Prisoner

An embarrassing prisoner was taken into a station-house in New York, recently. He was charged with being drunk and disorderly, and his appearance bore out the charge. But the man showed some traces of humor. He declared he had no name, when the sergeant wanted to enter his case on the blotter. He said a name was of no use to him and he did not have one. In reply to a question as to his home, he gave an address in Harlem. "What do the people there call you?" was the next question. "Well, sometimes they call me a thorough rascal; other times they say I'm of questionable ancestry, and then again when they are mad they kick me out without calling me anything." He was locked up, charged with being intoxicated. On the police blotter his name was given as "John Doe." Before going to his cell he said that he would go to court and prove that he never had a name. "And I don't want one," he added. "Am just as well off without any." He said he had no business, little money, no troubles and no kin. Doubtless he was anxious that his real name should not appear in the newspapers and so disgrace him among his friends, and he did not mind telling a lie to conceal it. One might wish that such a man might, in the mercy of God, be brought to repentance, and with a new life inherit the name that God will give to those who turn to him:

To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and I will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written (Rev. 2: 17).

BRIEF NOTES

About eight hundred and forty congregations in Scotland now use unfermented wine at the Lord's table.

North Dakota has adopted a constitutional amendment restricting the franchise to men who have had some education.

Of the 2,879 children admitted into Dr. Barnardo's Homes during 1900, two hundred and fifty-seven were babies in arms, and sixty-eight were deaf, dumb, blind, incurable, or crippled.

An old regulation has been re-enforced by the Turkish authorities, that Jews may only enter Palestine as tourists, limiting their stay to a maximum of three months. This is said to be through fear of Zionism.

Dr. Francis H. Marling, a well known member of New York Presbytery, died suddenly on Feb. 3, while on his way to hold service in a church at Port Chester, N. Y. He was seventy years of age, and had held important charges both in this country and Canada.

Recent alterations in the Italian capital have disclosed the ruins of a church which, as an inscription on its walls proves, is twelve hundred years old. Some of the frescoes are as fresh as on the day they were painted. It is thought that the church must have been destroyed by an earthquake which filled it with rubbish.

A cordial invitation to all residents and visitors to New York is extended to the Business Men's Prayer Meeting, which is held from noon till one o'clock, at 281 Greenwich street, on every business day of the year. It has been held for twenty-five years without missing a day, and its records are full of testimonies of answered prayer.

The new president of the British Sunday School Union is Mr. George Cadbury, the cocoa manufacturer. He has been a teacher at the Friends' Adult Schools of Birmingham for forty years, and his Bible class numbers upwards of 1,000 members. Five minutes for "family prayer" are spent every morning by 2,300 girls in his employ, and a service for the men and boys is conducted by Mr. Cadbury once a week.

Several American universities have received a number of ancient papyri from the Egyptian Exploration Fund. Among those given to Harvard is a fragment of a very old copy of Paul's Epistle to the Romans. Of the total 118 papyri, twenty-nine are presented to the University of Pennsylvania. The larger part of the papyri are from Oxyrhynchus, and the rest from various sites. The former is where the "New Sayings of Jesus" were found by the society, and also parts of St. Matthew, Mark and John, far antedating any other known text.

A Tenant's Mistake

A lady who hired a flat recently in one of the most fashionable neighborhoods in New York, made an amusing blunder at the beginning of her occupation. She ordered various changes made in the apartments and gave directions about the arrangement of her furniture. While the work was being done, she went to the flat to superintend the operations. Three men were hard at work in rough clothes and in their shirt sleeves. To each of these she gave a quarter as a recognition of their services. One of them was the janitor, whom she had met before. To him she said that she would like to have a handsome chandelier that was in one of the rooms removed, as she proposed to have a different system of lighting. The janitor consulted with his helpers, and one of them observed that it was a pity to remove the chandelier, as the room would not look so well without it. The lady, describing the incident to a reporter of the Times, said she answered the man somewhat snappily: "I don't see what business it is of yours, anyway, as I hire these apartments and pay the rent, and her way from Norfolk, Va., to Boston, Mass. They were in an open boat and had become almost desperate with hunger and cold. The captain of the wrecked ship reported that he ran into a heavy north-west gale soon after leaving Norfolk. The wind blew with great fury, raising a very heavy sea, in which the vessel labored and strained badly, causing her to spring a leak. The crew worked steadily at the pumps, but owing to the continuance of the storm the leak gained, and the vessel was full of water. The crew, however, made every effort to keep afloat, but at length the schooner was settling fast. Preparations were then made to abandon her. The only boat, which had been smashed by the storm, was hastily patched and the crew abandoned their vessel, which was then fast breaking up. The boat was scantily provisioned, and oars were made from lumber taken from the cargo, the oars belonging to the boat having been lost during the storm. All that night and the next day and the following night a lookout was kept for passing vessels, but none was seen until the dawn of the second morning, when the Alleghany was seen on the horizon. Then there were anxious hours before it was seen that the boat had been sighted, but finally they were taken on board and brought to land. If men were as anxious for spiritual salvation as those sailors were to be taken out of their leaky boat, how our churches

THE OBSEQUIES OF QUEEN VICTORIA

THE QUEEN'S BODY LYING IN THE CHAPELLE ARDENTE, OSBORNE HOUSE

The Royal Crown of England, the Sceptre, and Other Insignia, Rest on a Purple Velvet Cushion Upon the Queen's Coffin

ALTHOUGH the cable has already brought us the story of the obsequies of Britain's beloved Queen, that event, as now retold in the series of remarkable photographs on these two pages, will be invested with a new and deeply sympathetic interest. These photographs were taken by special permission, and give an accurate representation of occurrences that have now passed into history.

The funeral from Osborne House, Isle of Wight, was a quiet ceremonial. In the Chapelle Ardente, the Queen's body had lain wrapped in her bridal veil, and covered with the coronation robe she had worn when, while a young girl, she became Queen. Upon it had been placed the royal regalia—crown, sceptre and wand—all now laid aside forever.

Around the purple-draped bier, in the chapel dimly lighted by tall candles, lay great masses of beautiful, odorous flowers in a hundred different devices—crosses, pillows, shafts, stars, wreaths and garlands. From all classes and climes, came those voluntary tributes of love and esteem. It seemed as though the whole world strove to honor the dead Empress-Queen. Beside the rich floral offerings of great potentates lay the poor, simple gift of a wreath, or perhaps a bunch of roses, from some humble cottager. Hardly a monarch or prince in Europe was unrepresented, and Asia and Canada, too, sent their fragrant gifts to be laid beside the good Queen's coffin. Not the least touching was a harp of shamrocks and violets "from four poor Irish fishwives," and a meagre wreath from an old woman, the inmate of a workhouse, who had loved the aged Queen for her kindness to all the poor and the infirm.

When the funeral cortege took its way from Osborne to Cowes, a scene was presented which has scarcely a parallel in modern history. With the corps of kilted pipers in the lead, playing a mournful dirge, or "coronach," there was borne out of the castle to the open air, upon the shoulders of sturdy sailors, the last mortal remains of Victoria the Good. For the last time, the Grenadier Guards, who were drawn up in open order, presented arms in honor of their dead queen. Immediately behind the coffin came King Edward, Emperor William and a group of royal princes, all in glittering uniform, a brilliant array, pressing close upon the sailors, who moved slowly with swinging steps, timed to the shrill music of the pipes.

After the king's and emperor's party and with a little space between, came the strangest and most touching part of the gloomy pageant—the Queen and the royal princesses. All robed in soberest black and with veils nearly touching the ground, they walked in a little group huddled together and with heads bowed as though sobbing with grief. There were no carriages; all were afoot. Not a single ornament gleamed in that sad gathering. All worldly decorations and adornments had been discarded in the presence of death; and the simple habiliments of grief, the bowed heads, and slow, measured steps of the weeping women, as they walked past, touched the hearts of the multitude, and soon many were sobbing in sympathy.

When the procession reached the pier, and amid the beating of muffled drums, the body was reverently transferred to the royal yacht, Alberta, the second stage of the Queen's last journey had begun. Between two lines of great warships the yacht passed, being saluted with "minute guns" by each vessel in turn. Every battleship, from Cowes to Spithead, was manned, the yards covered with sailors and the bands playing funeral marches.

Accompanying the Alberta were several other steam yachts bearing the attendants of the funeral party. Emperor William's yacht, the Hohenzollern, was a prominent figure in the marine pageant. At Portsmouth the funeral party took train for London, where they arrived early the next morning.

Our other illustrations deal with the obsequies in London on the following day, when the dead Empress-Queen was borne through the streets of her ancient capital past the palace of the English sovereigns, with a pomp and splendor that were in striking contrast with the simple and almost severely plain ceremonial at Osborne. Cream-colored horses drew the catafalque; the pall was white; the trappings of the cavalry horses and the uniforms of the troopers and the soldiers generally were dazzling in their brilliancy.

Princes, dukes, marshals, generals, admirals, nobility and officers of all grades, blazing with decorations and gold lace, made the picture a resplendent one. The King himself wore the uniform of a field marshal. With the King and Queen were Emperor William, the kings of Greece, Portugal and Belgium, and other royalties and high personages. Thirty-five thousand troops took part in the funeral pageant, and the spectators could only be estimated by millions.

The main features of the obsequies in London have already been very fully described in the published cablegrams. The solemn pageant is shown passing through Hyde Park, with the royal carriage containing Queen Alexandra in front. All the way down to Paddington Station, where the cortege took train for Windsor, the streets were lined with silent and weeping crowds.

The next stage of the journey was from Windsor Station to the Castle. One of our illustrations shows the procession nearing the gates of Windsor, on entering which the remains were placed in St. George's Chapel, where the impressive funeral service of the Church of England was read.

Then, while the church bells of Windsor were tolling solemnly, the minute guns were booming and the castle bands playing funeral marches, the procession took up its burden for the last stage—to Frogmore—where the Queen's body was laid to rest in the beautiful mausoleum, beside that of her beloved husband and royal consort, Prince Albert.

PERSONAL PREACHING

DR. A. C. DIXON, HANSON PLACE BAPTIST CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

CHRIST preached his greatest sermons to individuals—to Nicodemus at midnight, to the woman of Samaria at midday. The personal worker must put himself under God's spirit for either the crowd or for the individual man. And it takes more grace to speak of Christ to the "one" man than to the throng. The true personal worker must put himself on a level with the one he seeks to reach. God employs different methods. To Peter, the fisherman, he appears with the sheet full of creeping things; to Cornelius, the man of power and authority, he sends an angel. He taught spiritual truths through the natural channels which most appealed to the one visited. And then when you have thus put yourself on this level, preach Jesus, not about Jesus. Philip might have preached about the authorship of Isaiah, about the style of the Old Testament writings—the eunuch might have asked such questions. But no, Philip preached Jesus.
